In case you hadn't noticed, this exhibition is what replaced the Vancouver Island Open Juried Exhibition five years ago. An open, juried exhibition was immensely popular with the artists and the community.

It gave everyone that illusion of democracy in which anyone could grasp the brass ring. Even a hope—so slight, so inconsequential—of acceptance in a show at the Art Gallery used to keep artists up late, working. The public had a chance to see work by people they knew, and could enjoy a diversity that had some relationship to current concerns in Victoria. Perhaps there were even discoveries to be made. But it was impractical for the gallery: difficult to insure, complicated to arrange, less to judge, and often a bit of a mosh in the final effect. And by its nature it excluded artists with pretentious ideas about their own grandeur. So now we have a show by two Victoria artists with a rather pointless geographical connection: The Vancouver Island Invitational Exhibition.

The exhibition is rather good. The artists chosen are relentlessly modern, and make some appeal to those whose appreciation is not a closed issue. Mary-Lynn Ogilvie's works are fabric, folded and opened, coated with color front and back. When she hangs them up they turn down like a bed. The colors are rich and thick, chosen with taste. If you look closely at the folded overlapped top edges, you can imagine the mountains of China. She may have felt the works a bit too simple, for she included extraneous grace notes—sticks, triangles, counterpoints. They probably could be seen as measuring devices. I call them unnecessary. Her paintings are clear and strong.

George Allen is a painter on canvas. Brushed-in colors create simple pictorial tensions on the canvas, properly resolved in a painterly fashion. The works aren't a thrill in the gallery, but some are the sort you can live with—watch the play of light on them, use them as elegant background screens, hang them in stairwells in ferroconcrete buildings. My favorite is Untitled 1981. It is a long horizontal work in pale green, blue and pink, with a red flash on the left. It reminds me of a swimming pool. The criss-cross of impasto and stained paint effortlessly call forth ripples.

My companion had this to say:

"I kind of liked Mary-Lynn Ogilvie's. She had apparently spent a long time making the paintings, the pleats and the paint, nice even folds all the way down. His were pretty, but a bit boring. The calligraphy was heavy handed, compared to what we've been seeing around here."

By the way, the catalogue cover is beautiful—a real sleeper—like venetian blinds into a world of unknown colors.

Christmas in Chinatown

It's NOT snowing on Christmas Eve in Chinatown. It's raining a bit and the neon is bleeding in pools down from the smiling Buddha and Don Mee. Is that the tinkle of sleigh bells or just the sound of the ragtime player piano jingling out from the back room of Jim's Antiques? The whispering rush of rain-wet tires on Fisgard Street washes it all away.

The blazing pink arrows, the glowing pagoda and the Golden Horse light up the painted bricks and cars and baskets on the sidewalk. This is not a special Christmas show. No carols peal from tiny speakers hung above doorways. Christmas is here, though. In the window of the Oriental Book and Gift Shop, along with the incense sticks, is a ten-inch high Sino-Santa Claus. He's porcelain and holds a tiny panda in one hand and a sack in the other. Maybe he's P'u Tai on holiday.

Across the road the Chinatown Trading Company has pinned golden sprigs of holly to a red paper fan. The showpiece of the window is a fantasy in red and green—Chinese dollies having a tea party, insinuating the season's greetings by color alone.

The Fan Tan Gallery is a sort of Christmas dream—woodstove and woollens, crystal and Christmas tree. The pot-pourri wreaths and gingerbread angels, works of art from the Bentham household, are probably the nicest Christmas items in Chinatown. And the purring shin-caress of Noko Marie, the Gallery cat, conjures up a small-town-far-away serenity that need not be broken.

Perhaps a few cab-drivers and all-night misfits will see the break of this special day perched on stools at Quonley's. Hugo Spilker's pipe organs will make a joyful noise to celebrate Christ's birth in some other neighborhood. Another Christmas will have come to Chinatown.
Yule love it

EATON'S DOWNTOWN Victoria store is one of the last stores in Canada to do a real Christmas wonderland animated window. As mall and skyscrapers cater less and less to a sidewalk crowd, the featured figures of Christmas displays have been left on the shelf. Whenever he can, Ken Little tries to get these mechanical dancers for his Eaton's branch in Victoria.

"We get lots of letters, phone calls, people wanting to know when the display will be up so they can bring the kids," Little says. "I think stores owe it to their public to have a fantasy display at least once a year."

For months prior to Christmas, the display department looks like Santa's workshop. Here are 14 lively dolls, still able to conjure up dreams. They stand on elevated bases which hide all manner of mechanical contrivances to make them move. Skaters pirouette, ballroom dancers circle one way and then the other, heads turn, bows are given and curtseys received. The dolls have stunning features, long noses and big eyes swept into graceful forms with make-up, paint and glitter.

Bill Patterson explains that the dolls were bought in 1945 from the Lord and Taylor store in New York. They weren't new then. But you wouldn't know it. Patterson gave them a lavish dressing up last year. Even with all the dolls functioning smoothly and their costumes spruced-up, it's still a three-day installation. The 10-person display crew are all involved, collecting greenery in the forest, painting backdrops and preparing to open the curtain today (Thursday) on a Christmas window to carry you back to the days when your Mom took you to see the magical windows.

Over at Thinker Toys, Yates and Broad street, a different kind of Christmas window has been commissioned by owner Lea Weir. A snowy, cuckoo-clock and gingerbread style village has been created by Jack Simon (famous for his outstanding sets for Bastion Theatre and Pacific Opera.)

A marionette is waiting at the door to welcome all. Silver satin stars shine above Tom Kitten and the kissin' cousins. Toys old and new peep out from under the eaves and can be dimly glimpsed behind frosty windows. For this is a three-dimensional advent calendar—a new door opens every day. Behind the next might be an antique mechanical elephant or a diminutive choir of Christmas musicians. Everyone wants to see what hidden behind the big door at the bottom. But we'll all have to be good and wait for Christmas.
EGARDLESS OF what has to be said about the paintings, Victoria is specially privileged to have the EH. Varley centennial exhibition at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria until January 24. Other than Victoria, the exhibit will be seen only in Edmonton, Ottawa, Montreal and Toronto. We owe this showing to the efforts of the chief curator, Ian Thom. It is a once-in-a-lifetime chance to see this artist's work, and is mandatory for all students of painting, art history, and anyone who ever goes to galleries or auctions.

"He tried to see deeply into the patterns that unite art, humanity and nature... But his findings were always tentative... He was at times indecisive, and was frequently more accomplished on a small scale... He got lost many times, but he never gave up the struggle." So says the catalogue, and I agree. This exhibit shows equal measures of success and struggle.

Varley will always be an icon of Canadian art history. He was a member of the Group of Seven; the National Film Board made a documentary about him; and his works now fetch huge prices. But we can't swallow the fame without some chewing.

The early stages of Varley's training gave him the equipment. Born in Sheffield, England, he learned to paint landscapes, low-keyed and moody, in the style of his day. The broken strokes us on tone rather than form, and show a debt to impressionism. Modelling by volume is replaced by a bold graphic pattern, the legacy of art nouveau and commercial art. As a young man he went to war and confronted a subject which couldn't be ignored—a landscape in turmoil, with incidental figures set in an existential field. The artist was trained and ready to go. But where?

To Canada, The subject matter in Canadian art was, more or less, limited to landscape and portraiture. Varley's portraits are masterful, strongly modelled, colored with a unique and intense originality. But he didn't have the temperament to be a sociable portraitist. His best work is the intense depiction of those he loved. And it is very good.

He made a connection with the Group of Seven before they grouped: He could paint in their style with ease—unpeopled scenes, broad strokes of clear color placed with rhythm and separation on a glowing golden wood panel. But Varley's mystic soul transformed this facile manner by introducing all sorts of things into landscape—broken trees, lonely forms, figures, sickle moons, furious brushwork and bizarre color schemes. Varley tried them all. Some work. Some don't.

Varley made discoveries significant to our vision of British Columbia. One of the most salient is a particular shade of blue-green. It is used in the hazy distances of Chinese landscape painting, and it's called malachite green. In the definitive (and justifiably expensive) catalogue, his grandson, Chris Varley, explains "he perceived 'color vibrations' emanated from objects," by the early thirties saw his objects through a 'film of color'."

The second contribution is the moving focus. As Varley said, "the sea is here, and the sky is vast; and humans—little bits of mind—would clamber up rocky slopes, creep in and out of mountain passes, fish in streams, build little hermit cabins in sheltered places, and curl up in sleeping bags and sleep under the stars... I often feel that only the Chinese of the 11th and 12th centuries ever interpreted the spirit of such a country." Only those Chinese, and Varley.

Varley's work is not always so successful. Country churches, groups of figures in the landscape, woodland groves, the stuff of many gentle landscapists—these were not his metier. He could usually make this sort of subject into a good composition, but often the color is murky, the drawing cursory, and the paper cheap and browning. A great deal of the work on show is far from being stimulating. Because it's a big show, it's far too big to show him only at his best.

The large works are not my favorites. Liberation and Dharana, two of his most famous, may have been a glory to work on close-up, but from a distance they turn to pewter and putty, with a message too deep for such agitated painting.

But there are small surprises. The slightest sketch of all, Dead Soldier, has incredible power. Here is a drawing far beyond technique and prettiness. Just the subject, and the grim and haste and honesty of a moment forever imprinted on one man's mind.

These 150 paintings are surely the most important exhibit of Canadian art history we've seen in so long.
UNTIL TWO weeks ago Man Yuck Tong, an 1880s herbalist shop at 544 Fisguard, was an authentic haunt of the old Chinatown. Behind orange plastic sunshades and jade plants, regulars occupied stools near a stove at the back and shared a curious water-pipe while the tourists bought wind chimes and wicker swans and kung fu shoes.

Though in later years it gave the appearance of just another oriental souvenir shop, the drawers of herbs, the cases of natural medicines and tools of the trade were all still there. But the clientele had grown old, and the young ones had been assimilated by western ways and Medicare. Vancouver's herbalists are doing well, but Victoria doesn't have enough new immigrants to keep the traditions vital.

The herbalist has now retired and sold the business. But Victoria hasn't lost this bit of history. The new owners are the Friends of the Provincial Museum. It seems that a few years ago a certain Dr. Ho from the National Museum of Man in Ottawa was here, identifying potential exhibits, and he made plans to buy the shop. But the indefatigable Dr. David Lai of the UVic geography department decided it would be more relevant in our own Provincial Museum. Lai suggested it to Zane Lewis, head of the museum's modern history department, who passed on the idea to the Friends of the Museum.

The shelves and shop signs, boxes and baskets, and all the paraphernalia of the herbalist lore, including dried snakeskins...
The Stephen Horne exhibit at Open Space this month apparently set out to rid us of the "aesthetics of objectification on the focusing of procedures on the object rather than on the sphere of relations assembled into art practice." The objects are supposed to be engaging enough to lead us into contemplation of the 'art practice'. It didn't work for me.

For those who saw the picture of Nietzsche's Hammer advertising the exhibit, perhaps an explanation is in order. So here it is, from the catalogue of the exhibit:

"Horne refers directly to the metaphysical nature of technology in a work composed with a hammer and the name of Nietzsche. Nietzsche's name is burnt on the wood handle of a sledge hammer. It would appear that the hammer belongs to Nietzsche and that the work is a reference to his desire to 'philosophize with a hammer.' But in Nietzsche's philosophy Nietzsche is the hammer and the 'speech of the hammer' is deliberately iconoclastic. In this work, the hammer is both the product and the symbol of heavy industry. Nietzsche's name is purified by its fires, and the letter 's' is dropped from the name in order to speed its visual impact. The hammer therefore, does not belong to Nietzsche nor is it the 'speech of the hammer.' Nietzsche is the hammer's brand, its will to mastery, which is the speech of all things technological. The Nietzsche hammer expresses the unprecedented exuberance of modern man in the face of his creation— technological culture."

What do you make of that jargon, John Duffie?

— Robert Amos
because the place must be geared to tourism, and I suppose it makes lots of money. And that’s not high art. But the fact is they give lots of wall space to local artists.

Good old Fenwick Lansdowne is represented by signed reproductions of his work. He is an excellent painter. If he would give the people in Victoria a close look at his original paintings it would do us all good. Not that anyone could afford to buy one, but the artists here could see how good he can be. After all, he lives here, doesn’t he?

Carl Coger is a real professional, almost slick. I think he does portraits at shop centres. But he can really handle pastels, and moreover, I like his vision of landscape. Also worthy of mention is that his work is relatively inexpensive.

Stewart Brands shows at Crystal Gardens Gallery too. He is a young Victorian who paints tiny landscapes, mostly gardens, of Victoria and vicinity. He uses an intense palette which borders on the psychotic, and his mosaic-like brushwork reminds one of Van Gogh. But he has a sincerely personal vision, and you should see what Victoria looks like through his eyes. He’s developing a strong style, slowly and surely. He’ll be one to watch.

The Crease Family show at the Archives really does give a feel for “the sphere of relations assembled into art practice.” By that I mean that through the personal objects collected we could understand a way of life which often resulted in art.

The Crease family archives are spread out before us. Letters and sketchbooks, photos, blueprints and tickets spill out, covered with signs of life. Of course, it’s all tasteful—so were the Creases. The story is clear, the material selected to appeal. The Archives gallery is quiet and dim, the displayed papers and paintings old-fashioned with an upper-class slant. The show is not a dazzler, but there’s lots to see.

Sir Henry Crease, born in 1823, was British Columbia’s first attorney-general. His family were keen recorders of their life and times. In those pre-snapshot days the Crease ladies, ladies of leisure, recorded the oxcarts of Victoria and the Fort, and every fustian gewgaw in the sitting room.
Set up the art
and knock it down

You could have started a collection of local art for a song: Nita Forrest $60, Len Gibbs $60, Framing Jorgensen $100, Herbert Siebner $90, Jack Wise $60, Yves Vial $95. For artists this was bad news but for art lovers the other night at Cal-Minshall Auctioneers, 919 Fort St., it’s a revelation. And the prices had apparently nothing to do with the quality.

Sitting on rented chairs, the buyers scribbled notes on the back of envelopes. The lighting was cruel, the numbered tags stuck to the paintings with a certain finality, bespeaking broken homes, a property adrift in the world. Auctioneer Don Cal just kept setting ‘em up and knocking ‘em down.

Of 108 items offered, only eight achieved their lowest estimate. Eight drew no bid at all, and the rest brought in bids disappointing to the artists and auctioneers, but offering bargains for buyers.

The quality of the work contributed to the slight interest of the sale. There just wasn’t much to buy. The choice items were two woodcuts by Walter J. Phillips ($2,100 and $700), and two woodcuts by Edwin Holgate ($550 and $525). Two watercolours by Samuel Maclure were eagerly bought for $425 each. An unappetising orange and ochre panel by A.Y. Jackson, from 1960, was withdrawn from the sale when the bidding made only $2,500. On the whole, it was pretty thin fare.

Max Maynard’s oil on paper paintings brought bids well over the estimate, selling typical work for $450 and $775, but those prices may have been enhanced by the presence of his dealer and his nephew in the audience.

For the other Victoria artists it was a slaughter. Perhaps the artists themselves sent a few items to the sale to keep the wolf a few steps back from the door. These days, anything’s worth a try. But the small audience seemed to be made up of buyers for antique shops and a few doctors looking for a smart investment. The rest were “tire kickers”, out for the free entertainment.

Auction fever seems to have been cured in Victoria, a city where only recently it ran rampant. Don Cal did his best to perk up the bidding, his auctioneer’s chant encouraging prices higher and higher. But his enthusiasm ran a bit thin. “That’s a bargain,” he announced, “Pastel landscape with mountains and it’s signed. I have 50 do I have 55? Are you all done and satisfied at 50? At 50, depressingly low. I can’t believe it,” he goes on, “It’s horrendous. The artist is 82 years old. Do I have 55?”

Though there aren’t many buyers this on, a look at the art history of this country will show it’s a wise time to buy. W.J. Phillips made many of his woodblock prints during the depression, and sold them very cheap, even trading them for potatoes. They’re precious now. A.Y. Jackson’s work went for rock bottom prices in the 1930s. In a few years we’ll look back on this time, when you could buy a Jack Wise for $60, and remember when it was a buyer’s market.

— Robert Amos
This book is a book full of clear reproductions, a book for “collectors and experts on Northwest Coast history”. It was written by two anthropology professors from State University of New York at Brockport and Victoria's own Vin Rickard.

Unique to this volume is the range of artists shown, 16 in colour and 79 in black and white. There are extensive appendices of artists' names and tribal affiliations, and a history of Indian prints going back to 1949.

Otherwise the book treats, in condensed form, subjects which are better treated elsewhere, such as the technique of screen printing and terms for printmakers. This and most other books on Northwest Coast Indian art suffer from a common failing. Each attempts to summarize the entire complex history of native peoples, from flora and fauna to mythology, smallpox to Mungo Martin. It's an amazing story, to be sure, but it's a tall order for the introductory chapters of a book about contemporary screen prints.

The reproductions, clearly the justification for the book, are not in any apparent order, grouped neither by artist, subject or date. And the book makes no critical response to the work.

Northwest Coast Indian graphic art is a bastard; son of Dzoonokwas or Sisooohl and long winter nights in the rain-forest; daughter of effete European printmaking traditions, the artist's proof, remarque prints, and museum mounting. When the movement is a memory, we will remember the kitsch of worlds in collision, St. Veronica's handkerchief in formlines. We'll forget about artists who never rose above the saleable Indian vernacular. It's the rare artist, for example Art Thompson, who gets off the fence and does more than trade on the tourist penchant for "heritage". This book treats all three equally.

It seems expensive at $35.

The Legacy is a delight and a bargain. Nowhere else will you get so many color plates or such provocative reading for $14.95.

This is a catalogue produced by the British Columbia Provincial Museum, hence its (subsidized) low price. The exhibit it accompanied was shown at the Edinburgh Festival in 1980 and included a judicious selection of contemporary Northwest Coast Indian art in conjunction with superb museum pieces from years ago.

This book also retells the story of the history of the region — flora and fauna, society, contact, art and decline, in seven pages. But Peter McNair does it with precision and grace. The book goes on with imagination. A bent box is “unfolded” for us in color plates. Form lines and templates are clearly depicted. The proximity of historical and modern photographs is rich.

If you've been backstage at the museum, you know that Northwest Coast art does not look like what we’ve come to expect. The variety of effect is unlimited, in design, colour or application. This book represents it as more exotic than precious, showing abstract paintings, a bignose snot-thrower mask and so on.

The artists emerge from the text as men and women of skill and training — it is the connection of artists and their work that makes the museum an art gallery.

The text is so good you want to match up every word with the accompanying picture. Unfortunately the layout is so “designed” that I had to keep fingers in three pages at a time. But if you only buy one book on Northwest Coast art, this is it. And if you have the rest, you’ll love this one.

A SERIES of small explosions rocked 555 Herald Street. But it was just fireworks, signalling the reopening of the new Victoria Chinatown Intermediate Care Facility, a gleaming new 30-bed facility, built with help from the municipal, provincial, and federal governments. From sod-turning to opening, construction took only 371 days.

The centre replaces the original Chinese Hospital, built in 1899 on the same site by the Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association (CCBA). Running the hospital had always been a financial burden on the association. In the early days, a Chinese person leaving Canada to return to China was obliged to make a $2 donation to the hospital. The receipt was his “exit permit”, and no boat-ticket could be purchased without one. After the 1920s, most Chinese returned via Vancouver.

The building actually functioned as a special boarding house for elderly Chinese men. Jurisdiction, status and funding went back and forth between city and the Association after the hospital went broke in 1929. In 1962, a labourer named Dong Gong left the hospital his estate of $25,000 which, in part, paid for a renovation in 1964. But in 1979 the hospital was finally closed because it had been running at a loss for years.

But the need for a long-term care facility to serve elderly Chinese in their own community still existed, so Dr. David Lai, of UVic's Geography Department, took matters in hand and rallied support. The city leased the site for $1 a year. Mortgage funds of about $1.5 million were made available through Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The Ministry of Health and the Capital Region Commission contributed their help.

The care centre is a unique facility. Open to all the elderly, Chinese or otherwise, it provides Chinese cuisine and a Chinese-speaking staff. The 30 beds will soon be filled, and those who already make this their home look pleased indeed.

The bravura approach

WALTER DEXTER and LENI HOOVER
Whales Gallery, 1007 Fort Street, 385-5525
Until April 3.

Walter Dexter is a craftsman, and is capable of superb control in every facet of pottery. So when he cuts loose and lets chance and the unexpected inform his artistry, you’ll see a show with more than the usual to look at.

Whales Gallery is presenting just such a show. Dexter’s biography is extensive, beginning in the early 1950s and ranging the length and breadth of western Canada. Almost 30 years of teaching here and exhibiting around the world have brought awards and medals in profusion, and enough experience to equip him with a profound understanding of what he is doing. When he speaks, we listen.

Dexter is best known for his well-controlled red glazes. But this exhibit features unorthodox raku wares, and they are eloquence itself. The well-potted shapes are confident and capacious. Oversized “tea bowls” are a big double handful. The lidded straight-side jar is anything but timid. He makes amphorae, tall vessels with handles joining body to neck, with conviction. They seem Mediterranean in effect, not in all Japanese.

In fact, unlike many potters, Dexter’s work is not consciously oriental. This collection of pottery exploits a huge range of glaze colours. One typical pot is glazed pink, pale yellow and dark green on a smokey grey unglazed ground. Decoration may be brush-drawn with abandon, inscribed graffiti, burnt by chance, and deeply crackled and stained—all this on the same pot. This is not the restrained shibui of the Japanese tea cult. This is the full-bodied bravura approach of a concommitant craftsman, a Canadian and an artist.

Dexter’s flying brush is never in danger of becoming precious. There is something pleasing about the instant trace of the brush fixed forever in the firing. The firing takes an act of the human will and turns it into elemental nature. For all the attention Dexter gives his pots, they are not self-conscious. One can’t help feeling that he must really enjoy making them.

Leni Hoover is showing her gouache paintings in the same gallery. The brush strokes of her paintings are right up front, as in Dexter’s pottery. And her concerns are, like his, elemental: fire, water, earth and air.

Hoover has been four years working on this series of paintings. One of the self-imposed limits is a four-colour palette of cadmium red, cadmium green light, prussian blue and ochre or gold.

The colours are applied first as a wash in broad, formal patterns. The rough texture of the paper retains the granulated pigment in the natural sedimentation patterns of a river valley.

Here is controlled, precise mapping. The effect is almost scientific. Because of her controlled technique, the imagination is allowed plenty of room to play in these works, but they yearn for further exploration. Her failure to penetrate deeper connections between the organic nature of the painting and the overlying draughtsmanship leaves one hungry for something more profound.

GOODWILL ENTERPRISES, 560 Yates, long popular for ridiculously inexpensive tweed jackets, white shirts and bowling shoes, now has a parts department. “I call this an electrical handyman’s paradise,” says Warren ‘Buck’ Raymond, the new manager of the department.

“Since we opened a week ago there’ve never been less than four people in here,” he says. And now a dozen customers are milling about among the radios and cords, tape recorders, ranges, elements, controls, picture tubes, tuners and clocks, windows for washing machine doors, vacuum cleaner wands, searching for the right obsolete knob, or just admiring bins full of gorgeous gadgets. There’s an atmosphere of mutual help as Buck Raymond satisfies another customer. “Yes, ma’am, 49 cents for an electrical cord for the iron.” No hype, no packaging, no guarantee. But the price is unbeatable.

The electrical repair depot of Goodwill Enterprises is in their Bay Street plant. About 10 people work there, and what they can’t fix they dismantle for their own repair stock. Now, if there’s a surplus, it comes to the Yates Street Store.

Maybe you know people who throw away the drier because the drive belt squeaks. It’s obviously time to trim some of the fat off our lifestyles. There are a lot of folks willing to do more with less, and to do it themselves. The parts department is a new idea, a good one, one which we will see more of as we go deeper into the ‘80s.

“Heads for your vacuum cleaner? Sorry, they haven’t come down yet. Next week maybe. This place is really popular, and we’ll be getting more stock as it goes along. We have everything electrical.” Buck is standing in front of a shelf of slightly obsolete adding machines and other moribund mechanical marvels. “Some work, some don’t. Take a chance.” You can hardly go wrong. Raymond’s goodwill is obvious, and enterprising in the best sort of way.

Visions from the subconscious
PHYLLIS SEROTA, Kyle's Gallery
1545 Fort St., 592-2211, until April 10

Phyllis Serota's current show at Kyle's is her first exhibition of paintings in Victoria.

The first thing that attracted me was the visual impression—a variety of bright colours and bold compositions sing out from the walls. And immediately after came the imagery, the story line, the way that Serota is putting her life and feeling right out front. In this she resembles a feminine, self-referenced Max Bates, a happier Richard Ciccimarra.

She gives so much in her work—there is none of the ripped-off boredom with which formalism often leaves its audience. Her subjects often spring from psychological concerns—despair, waiting, separation, masks. Dreams from our collective subconscious make paintings which are at once striking and obvious. I Dreamed Last Night I Was on a Boat to Heaven is Dante brought home. And her nude on a bus crowded with oblivious fellow travellers is alarming in its familiarity.

Especially noteworthy is her painting of Polish defectors, a group portrait of delicate human dynamics. Paintings of contemporary events are almost untouchable by galleries and yet the imagery is something that media compels us to share. To add something to this media fix, to treat the subjects as more than pop art, is a rare event, almost unique in recent Canadian art.

It is the events of Serota's world which are the real meat of the show. Sadie and I is a portrait of the artist and her dog walking in the oyster light of a Victoria morning beach scene. The carefully judged distance between woman and dog in the painting makes visible a living relationship. In another, a nude woman rising from the bed on which her lover still relaxes, relates a human story we can all understand. (Why it is hung almost out of sight, next to the toilet, is another story). Rather than the psychosis which often drives people to paint, here we see a gentle, loving psychology in pictures.

As a painter, Serota is no slouch. Her even tonalities, set in handsome harmonies, show facility. Yet she paints basically to get the message across, not stopping with the beautiful but seeking to set up deeper resonances.

The inclusion of her self-portrait in the show reveals that she can paint the human face in a very articulate way. Many of the faces in her show seem a little blank. If she wants to take her art more into the particular realm of 'warts and all', I'll be glad to follow her.

But at the moment there's lots to see. She doesn't lack technique, and her insights are loving, humanistic, and satisfying.

Sunday Afternoon at the Industrial Site

After tea, time for a seaside walk. Over the Johnson Street Bridge, on the railway tracks. No trains there. The other side of Victoria. What a strange place.

There's a big pink warehouse on the foreshore - a great spot for a hotel.

Part of Parliament Buildings and Empress, Rattenbury's neo-classical wax museum, the Princess. Over here, among the big white tanks and the boxcars - one wonders how the developers can keep their hands off.

What goes on up there? A mountain of gravel and tips of broken concrete. Isn't this Victoria's helicopter heliport? Turn to look at Victoria's most beautiful views across the inner and outer harbours to the Strait and see - The Terrace!

The Tower used to rise above a cluster of buildings, but they've been cleaning up the vacant warehouses for weeks. Now there's nothing but the lone tower, rising five stories above the world. A concrete eagled cruiser, nest for the master of all he surveys. The steel cage steps hang derelict from the room at the top. The cement floors up there was a minefield.

Minefield of black holes, the very stuff of bad dreams. Whatever you dropped fell for a long long time. Steel frame windows without glass commanded views of fishermen's Wharf and the Olympics, the Echo and Maggie and the planes.

It looks like the tower will go soon. Down in the ruins the wrecker's golden day shovels sit. The lights of the Parliament Building turn the twilit sky to ultramarine. Wind beats waves against weathered rocks of roofing paper at the shoreline.

A guy in a pickup pulls over, window down, to talk in the gathering dusk. "Work over and I'll," he says, gesturing with his bandaged finger. Lime Bay Snake Hill. "They got rid of this building pretty quick. Some kids got trapped here for about six hours to get them out. So the parents got it torn down." No doubt it was dangerous.
What about the tower? "Maybe dynamite it," he suggests. "We used to do night watch here, check all this stuff. But it's going fast. Will might be next. Then what am I gonna do?"

He says they might make a park here or a hotel. But as an abandoned industrial site, it's subline.
LINCOLN CLARKES got off with a warning the other night. And the police confiscated his valise full of spray paint until he clears out of town. He was at it again, decorating the construction fence on Fort and Quadra. “They caught me red, blue and yellow handed,” the 24-year-old Clarkes admitted.

Clarkes’ zig-zag spray panels appear (and disappear) with erratic frequency on construction fences in Victoria, Vancouver and Toronto. They show a persistent effort and good design that no casual spray-bomb sloganeer can match. His paintings are like laundry soap box graphics, hit-and-run pop art. By now he has done about 200, including more than 20 in Victoria.

Clarkes has been doing this work since the spring of 1980. It was such a good idea that now it seems obvious: the artist provides some colourful relief in his environment and meets the public where it lives. Art galleries are not answering these needs. “I couldn’t afford canvas and I didn’t have the studio space,” says Clarkes. Now people gather near the street works, put up posters as close as they can, even steal the panels. And there is a segment of the public which has come to look forward to and appreciate his work. Clarkes also encourages media coverage—Vancouver Art Gallery’s Vanguard Magazine recently reviewed his work.

The forces of uniformity destroy his street art regularly. Clarkes’ addition to the boarding around Vancouver’s new Art Gallery had to go—private property versus vandalism, you know. And his relations with building site people are limited to run-ins with the foremen (“What are you doing painting on fences instead of working?”). So he works after hours, undisturbed except for the danger and threats from police.

How does he respond to the heroism of this Robin Hood role? He seems gentle, almost altruistic, hardly a vandal at all. “Somebody has to do it,” he says.

Artistic Eros

It’s hard to find the third annual Erotic Art Show, but it’s worth the trip. The show is on until April 10 at Chinatown’s New Era Social Club, 551½ Fisgard, an artist’s club room which has been a centre for bizarre but necessary activities for four years now.

Up the long dark stairs is a show of about 100 paintings, photographs and sculpture by fifty artists. It is essentially wide open, unjuried and follows the Eros theme, a theme every creative person has dealt with, usually as a side issue to other preoccupations. Almost everyone comes out of the closet to be part of this show.

Among the fifty artists exhibiting are sculptors Neil Dalrymple, Harry Schafer, Deanne Pettipas and Luis Ituarte, and painters Lloyd Cook and “Angel”, with techniques ranging from quivering sculptures in wire to pastels and oil glazes.

STONES GALLERY, 1715 Government
Jim Lindsay paintings Until April 24

Jim Lindsay is a painter who always puts on a good show. He was formerly an art teacher at the William Head Penitentiary, one of those jobs which an artist takes to support his family. And it's one which demands a certain vigour, a personal intensity. I imagine that to teach in the prison one must hold firmly to well-founded beliefs, with gravity — I mean this has got to be one heavy guy. Lindsay is just that. You can see it in his solid and well-made paintings.

Lindsay hasn't taught in the pen for years now, but he was a painter in his basement on a quiet street in town. His neighbours don't know what he's up to, but the National Gallery does. And so does the Nickel Art Museum at the University of Calgary. They held a one man show of his paintings last month.

The large canvasses at first glance seem to be gratuitously abstract gestures, squiggles and blobs applied with haste and a colour sense which is anything but pretty. Borders of geometric form, quickly brushed in, often enclose and amplify a central image. But his paintings leave no doubts. Take a good look, the abstract image begins to "look like" something — a head in the sky, a landscape, or a figure.

Slowly, what at first seemed an accident in paint becomes recognizable as a woman sitting on a bench in an airport. The horizontal black band above her must be the runway. Then the top-most blue stripe can be the sky. And those green slashes of paint really do shimmer and weave in the air like search lights. In making these transitions, Lindsay can take us from abstracted colours in composition to something anecdotal, almost romantic, without gimmickry. The shift is done with such consummate paint-handling that it takes a bit of patience before the levels of the work become apparent.

And yet once you've seen one work change from the unnameable to the carefully depicted, you'll want to try out your perceptions on the other paintings. Jim Lindsay's paintings are rather difficult at first, but very satisfying in the long run.

David Bruce's colour photographs, one of several photographic exhibits currently showing in town (see Calendar for details), are also on display at Stone's Gallery.

THE WORD FROM AFAR

It is always with great anticipation that we eagerly await, from our distance, any news and reviews of sculptures by Darcy Gould. ("The new 'now' art gallery", Monday, Mar. 12-18)

Having had the pleasure of bearing witness to this Canadian's magnificent talent it was with delight we received the Robert Amos review of Gould's first show in his chosen home base of Victoria.

Our delight quickly turned to dismay as we wandered through this exercise in subjective journalism.

The love, care and attention to detail that have become Gould trademarks permeate his works, catching even the most untrained eye. Yes, frequently his subjects are women—or "women's parts" as Mr. Amos writes with such obvious distaste—but witness Gould's fine appreciation of woman as beauty personified. Apparently Gould is proud to admit through his art that he genuinely likes women.

We respectfully suggest that Mr. Amos may be more concerned with remaining on safe reviewing territory than offering alternative, artistic perspectives.

It is presently somewhat trendy to cry loudly at any suggestion of further exploitation of women. Generally this is both true and necessary but such a stance here as Gould sculptures are among the finest modern representations of the female human body as a wonder of nature in the tradition of Rodin and Malo\l. Please, enough of this intellectual only art critique.

We need more art we can feel from our hearts as well as from our heads. Equally important to address is the question of Canadians once again leaving it to non-Canadians to first recognize internal universal talent.

Must Gould follow that too often repeated pattern of Canadians first achieving recognition elsewhere prior to receiving their just reward in their homeland? We sincerely hope not.

For our own part we are definitely looking forward to the Gould sculpture exhibit arriving in Australia later this year.

We hope Canadians will be equally delighted to support him in his international endeavors.

CANDIED ANATOMY

I was very disappointed in the review by Robert Amos. ("The new 'now' art gallery, Monday, March 12-18) on Darcy Gould's showing at Stones Gallery.

It seems unfortunate to me that in 1982 Canadian artists should suffer the most negative reviews from their own countrymen.

Mr. Gould's Toronto show seemed to draw a much more sophisticated and aware review than did the typically west coast provincial attitude displayed by Mr. Amos.

As a feminist I find Mr. Gould's work to be not only tastefully done, but sensitive and flattering to women. I feel that Mr. Amos, for whatever reason, entirely missed the point of Gould's work; which is that of displaying women as beautiful sexual beings. Too bad Amos perceives Gould's work to be that of anatomies as confection.

PORN AND HUMILATION

It is obvious that Mr. Hofsees has been well-schooled in the Playboy philosophy and just can not see beyond it ("Sexuality in the 80's: The Feminist Challenge", Monday, Mar. 26-Apr. 1). He takes up the pro-porn banner, intoning statistics to show pornography is not correlated to violence, and just can not see beyond it.

SUPERFICIAL WIT

Robert Amos' review of the Vancouver Island Invitational at the Victoria Art Gallery (Monday, Jan. 8-14) barely deserves to be called a review. It did very little to either encourage or challenge the readers to view the show for themselves. Neither any quantity of information nor any depth of understanding were present. Mr. Amos' comments about the work were at best clichéd attempts at superficial wit. Their tone was perhaps to front with a smile the rather underhanded swipes he took at his former employer's present curatorial policy.

My own reaction to the show was regret that each artist could not be given the entire space which they shared. Their cramped quarters made it difficult to view any individual work in isolation. George Allen's work I found particularly interesting, especially the small, square, green, yellow and blue "weedy" one and the long one with the red canoe end.

It's unfortunate that Monday did not accord both artists the courtesy of a reviewer who actually meant to review their work.

Vincent Varga

Maltwood Museum

Vincent Varga's installation at the Maltwood gallery is about focus. Eighteen two-foot squares, thickly coated with shiny black acrylic, hang suspended in a rectangle, delimiting a dim zone in the middle of the gallery. In their changing highlights simple signals can be read — parts of triangles, fan shapes, forked sticks. Iridescent purple like potassium permanganate, tarnished silver and thin limewash white have touched high points, applied with studied casualness or aggressive haste. These sheets dangle and lilt in the air currents, slick surfaces responding to a spotlight.

At one end of the zone a spotlight, on a tripod, stands high. Across the middle is a screen which acts as a lens or a filter. Made of clear plastic sheeting, it carries marks which define the focus. All but a six foot square in the centre is scribbled over. The square is inscribed with a circle. The circle is inscribed with a triangle, point downward. The triangle is lightly sanded in arcs, giving the effect of a fresnel lens. It casts a bluish shadow on the floor.

The cone of blue shadow spreads across the floor. One further square of glossy black acrylic lies in its field, as a crucible for the effect of the focused light. Not surprisingly there are ashes and charcoal there, the remains of whatever got in the way.

Looking back to the hanging square, dark non-colours and obscured imagery, they seem to have absorbed the spent spotlight radiation. The ashes and charcoal are any object returned to its simplest components.

In conversation, Varga elucidated some of his concerns and intentions. The spotlight end of the situation features a certain geometry. The rational side of man's nature is implied by the markings on the surrounding painted squares — triangles, fans. On the other side of the screen are signs of intuition. The forked stick as wishbone or divining rod appears not only on the hanging pieces but is drawn in the ashes of the crucible. The central screen is in balance. The triangle within circle within square lacks only the human figure to become Leonardo's 'man as the measure of all things'. Each viewer becomes the measure.

In fact there is another element in this piece. Between crucible and screen is another triangle, point downward, this time made of fishing line marked in black at regular intervals. The possible referents of this item — surveyor's measure, drawing in space, sight lines — are not convincing. The element weakens the symmetry. Only through the apparent simplicity of the piece do its subtleties begin to show, and this fishline triangle is extraneous.

Varga asked me what it felt like to be inside this piece. In retrospect, it did make me feel at ease and pleasantly able to reflect on its home-made cosmos. Unfortunately that's a reaction only possible for those willing to submit to its forces — the artist or the art critic.

The piece begins as a spot of pure light, acts through irreducible geometry, and ends as carbon darkness. The hanging sheets, their marks and memory, are a witness to the events of time. It's quite calm in there by the ashes of the campfire.

New glass and old

GLASS, North Park Studio,
1040 North Park, 381-3422, until May 4

The new North Park Studio is presenting an exhibition of new and antique glass. It's a subject I know nothing about. But the objects are understated and sensuous.

They don't need any explanation. The question of "what do you do with" delicate, dangerous, dust-catching objets d'art is simply answered: you look at them.

The show offers every inducement to viewers. Among the items for sale are a set of six Daum drinking glasses, a Tiffany candy dish, two Steuben lamp glasses and a little Lalique ring dish with a moulded green glass rabbit. Those big names will surely draw the curious and the collectors.

And the antique lighting by Waterglass Studios enhances what is already one of the loveliest display spaces in Victoria.

The best part, though, is the new glass, gathered from many of the best American artists in this trendy new field. Many people know the name of Dale Chihuly, recently featured in Life Magazine. A basket-like vase of his is right up front in the window, and nearby two undulating seashell shapes in pink and blue nestle together. On the walls are mysterious slabs of milky glass made by Paul Marioni. Faces loom up from the whirling glass like St. Veronica's handkerchief. Jenny Langston of New Mexico is well represented by a number of sturdy vases. Squares and squiggles of coloured glass are inlaid into smooth shaped bowls. John Reed displays work etched or sculpted by sandblasting.

This exhibit was put together with love, from a specialized point of view. Education, rather than sales, seems to be the purpose. A pleasant experience, indeed.

Images of the east
36 ARTISTS FROM SUZHOU, CHINA
McPherson Playhouse Mezzanine
386-6400, until May 31

This is the best art show in town. Thirty-six artists from our sister city, Suzhou, have sent 60 paintings and woodblock prints of landscapes around their home. While they show varying degrees of skill in execution, the rich imagination displayed is inspiring.

The ink-and-colour paintings make up the largest part of the show, and look typically Chinese. This year the themes are old-fashioned throughout; not a tractor or a power plant in sight. But the wonderful traditions of Chinese painting, including the high perspective which enhances the space and depth, and underpainting of unleashed calligraphic abstraction, are capable of limitless influence to painters, modern or otherwise. Two little roundels, scenes of children in a garden, are especially fine. And of course one can see mountain ranges laid in at a stroke, or mineral colours smouldering blue over deep deep ink washes.

The oil paintings are not very appetizing. The springy ink line does not translate into oil paint, and the artists seem to have abandoned their own marvellous approaches to space in favour of the dead end of one point perspective.

But the woodcuts! These prints are so sophisticated, surely part of a huge living tradition. The block carving is exemplary, whether done with minute precision or rudimentary vigour. The inking of the block, and the dampening of the paper, are used to create a galaxy of stunning effects—moonlight, rain, reflections on water, deep shadow. Scenes of city life, buses and houses, show up in this democratic medium.

The bright gouache scenes of communist glee that we saw a few years ago at Victoria's Art Gallery are missing. But there's lots to look at. Our thanks to the McPherson Foundation and the Chinese/Canadian Friendship Association.

Miles Lowry, at 23 years old, has been building up steam and now he's let it loose at Gallerie Untitled.

The extensive collection of his paintings in all media is highlighted by his work with airbrush—gently cubist figurative work and Matisse-like still lifes. Decorated ceramics, glass amulets and intriguing stone carvings arise from his knick-knack background and, occasionally, ascend to the heady realms of art. A more austere and coherent selection of Lowry's work would have given us a more serious tone but at this stage he's ringing the changes with his extensive talents. Lowry is one to watch.

K.C. Tebbutt's Gallerie Untitled—behind those red, yellow and blue banners across from the McPherson Playhouse—has now been painted and carpeted and seems to be ready to take itself seriously. Its innovative marketing program looks unworkable. The future may not be rosy, but it will definitely be exciting.

Leafhill's new show looks much like its old one. Harry Heine's technique is always worth study. Among painters of west coast fish boats, Marke Simmons shows quite well, with his complex notions of lighting. For those whose artistic judgement is backed up with "concern for our environment" and minutely rendered detail, there are a variety of stiff birds and animals, a few very slight Len Gibbs items, two small Walter Phillips woodcuts, and Dorothy Oxborough's big-eyed, fat-faced native kids.

Do you need organically grown bedding plants at rock bottom prices? How about herbs for drying or transplanting? Tomatoes, broccoli, cauliflowers and strawberries are ready to leave their Fernwood home and take up residence in your garden. Parsley, chives, fennel, sage, thyme and a surprising seven varieties of mint are grown at the Fernwood Solar Farm (behind Vic High, at North Park and Chambers).

This urban farm began two and a half years ago as an allotment garden in a parking lot. With the financial support of Labatt's Breweries, a greenhouse was constructed. Now fat winter cauliflowers burst forth under glass, solar panels gather sunshine, and trays of strawberry plants flourish, well in advance of the season. No longer on the allotment plan, it's now one big well-planned garden, under the guidance of a full-time farmer Stewart Boutilier. Extensive plots are intensively cultivated, full of companion planting and "volunteers" seeded from last year's crop. Rockeries, liquid manure tanks and seaweed compost bespeak the wisdom of a 100 per cent recycled philosophy. The garden can absorb as much energy as willing helpers put in. Many of the gardeners are incentive workers from the local human resources office, or first-time offenders doing their community service sentence, but more hands are always welcome. Eight hours a month entitles one to a share of the produce. There are always a few folks digging in this natural paradise, with the bees under the apple trees.

Saturdays are best for plant shopping, and later in the season low-priced vegetables will be available too. So dig in!

Cal-Minshall & Co., 519 Fort Street,

Walter J. Phillips (1884-1963) has been the success story of Canadian art speculation for almost 10 years now. The price of his colour woodcut prints has risen from less than $100 to more than $3,000 in that time. Though the increase may never be so steep again, the interest in his work will not diminish.

Cal-Minshall is presenting for sale 100 works of the highest quality by Phillips—watercolours, woodblock prints and engravings.

Phillips was born in Britain. After training and youthful perambulations (to the South African diamond mines), he brought his young family to Canada, settling in Winnipeg in 1913. The English watercolour style—clear tones, evenly brushed and blended—he adapted to Canadian scenes, strengthening the colours. Later, on a trip to England he met and studied with the Japanese woodcut artist Y. Urushibara. Back in Canada his watercolours took on a further simplification, discrete areas of colour representing what would later be carved in cherry wood.

Phillips laboured diligently, becoming Canada’s premier, if not only, colour woodcut artist. Printing editions of up to 250, from dampened paper in Winnipeg in the winter, without a press—it was hard work. But large editions and low prices helped him keep his work before the public and he survived the “Depression” as a practising and professional artist. Then the far west drew him on and in the late 30s he sketched the Rockies. Phillips loved trips up the coast and was one of few artists to appreciate the art of the Northwest Coast Indians. In later years he taught in Banff, and he ended his days in Victoria.

The work is always pleasing. Masterful asymmetrical designs are composed of firmly bounded shapes, with nothing left to chance or accident. The accuracy of his colour choices is impressive—just the right azure sky, the mauve shadows of snow, or the oyster light of evening falling on boat bows. The tree which cuts dramatically across the foreground, the gentle reserves of white indicative of snow, and fading twilight tints of an evening of the lake—this artist depicted a view of Canada we all can recognize.

If Phillips has a failing, it is just that safe perfection which always pleases, never excites. He was not a great artist, like his contemporaries L.L. FitzGerald, David Milne or Emily Carr. But his formal language is expert and inventive, his output is utterly consistent, and it was meant to be democratically available.

This sale, at what is otherwise an auction house, is a bit of a novelty. And raises some questions. Where did these works come from? And who would choose this time to try to sell them at higher prices than ever before? And, most important, why is there an admission charge? Theoretically, one is buying an entirely unnecessary catalogue. But, in reality, it simply costs $2 to look at the show. If the admission went to charity, as it often does on Old Bond Street in London, or if the work was not for sale, as at the Art Gallery, there would be some justification. But here is a very good show, a superb educational resource for art history and practice. And the admission price will keep away all those who need to learn from it.

Sir John A.'s floating thigh
OUR FORMER MEMBER OF PARLIAMENT AND PRIME MINISTER, IN STONE
Pandora St. entrance to city hall
Until it crumbles away

A short time ago, this city unveiled a statue of Sir John A. Macdonald. It was made by John Dann of Montreal and it now stands outside the front door of our city hall.

Regardless of everyone's good intentions, the statue is flawed. The scale model, which was on show upstairs at the MacPherson Playhouse, seems correct. But the larger-than-life size outdoor model is anatomically impossible. The thigh bone just won't join to the pelvis, causing Macdonald to be locked into a permanent awkward lurch. Something should be done.

Here on the West Coast we have one of the world's great carving traditions. We also have sculptors like Harry Schafer, producing technically superb work in bronze, with little or no public support. Now, about this sculpture from Montreal...

FROM HOLOGRAMS TO THE HORNBY ISLAND DUMP

By ROBERT AMOS

Jerry Pethick, an inventor and artist, pursued his vision with a total disregard for conventional uses of old refrigerators, mirrors, and religion.

Pethick's experiments with holography began in the United States Armed Forces in Detroit, Michigan, where he developed and patented holographic materials for use in defense projects. His work with holography led him to explore the potential of the medium in everyday life, resulting in the creation of art installations and sculptures.

Pethick's work with holography spanned several decades, and he continued to experiment with the technology and its applications. His creations have been exhibited in galleries and museums around the world, and his influence on the field of holography has been significant.

Pethick's work with holography continues to inspire artists and scientists alike, and his pioneering efforts have opened up new possibilities for the use of holography in various fields. His legacy as a visionary artist and inventor lives on, and his contributions to the field of holography will be remembered for years to come.
Petrick has been working on a big new project, entitled "Stratigraphy Distortion." Nanaimo's Malaspina College showed the first section in February. Seattle's And/Or Gallery presented the second part, and currently three rooms at the Vancouver Art Gallery are devoted to the work as part of the stimulating Mix & Scene installation.

He looks forward to the time when all nine sculptures and three panels can be seen together. The sculptures and the "flatwork" are complex light transmitters, alive with moving reflections and glowing spectral colours. Those who would like to "get their eyes in training" can see his work at Stone Gallery (1715 Government Street, June 15-30, 353-4610) or at the Vancouver Art Gallery (1145 West Georgia Street, until July 6). The Victoria showing will be comprised of the "flatwork", drawings of a singular sort.

The following interview was recorded at the artist's home. He's seated with a quart-sealer of home brew beer in his hand. Three or four fellow islanders idly away another idyllic afternoon. Old lighthouses full of water and things on string dangle from the ceiling, moving slowly in the Hornby Island breeze.

Petrick is gap-toothed and grizzled, dressed in a grey woolen undershirt and tattered work pants. He's talking about snow-blindness and inflatable dams. Laundry and disembowelled automobiles dot this clearing at the end of the road. Here, Petrick is lord of the manor, ignoring economics, staying out late, and playing host to the thriving of locals and poets and practising non-artists who come over to see him.

MONDAY: You started out as a sculptor.

PETHICK: Somehow along the way I got interested in light. When I was working in plaster I began to paint it—a dual process which was very off-putting. You make something dimensional and then totally change it by putting colour on it. How I got into photonics: the colour is inherent in that medium. And also with paint came the idea of transparency, reflections, and all that stuff. The light, then, became more obvious.

It was about that time that I began to explore holography. Holography is a type of photography of the interference patterns of coherent light. When the photo is illuminated a three-dimensional image occurs. I spent eight years working with holograms. When I saw the first one at the Imperial College, I said to the man who made it, "I understand you've made sculpture obsolete." He said, "I hope so."

What I was into about holography was, it was an illusionary reality that you couldn't tell from 'real' reality. What became interesting, though, was not the image of the object in the illusory space but the space itself. You could actually define an illusory space, whether there was anything in it or not. You could actually define a space within a space. The only commodity you really had to work with was light and space.

Holography puts you in a very rarified atmosphere all the time. You have to be in a dark room, and it gets very boring to be spending all your time in the dark. I would go home at nine in the morning—it's another day and I was going to bed. When making holograms, it's much quieter working at night—less vibration. And anytime you wanted to look at anything you had made it was "lights out—lights on". Then, later I'd go out in the sunshine and, "hey, there's plenty of light here for everybody, you know? What am I doing?"

I realized I was interested in light, not holography. Even when I was doing holograms I was illuminating a lot of them with ordinary white light, not with lasers, and there were a lot of spectral colour constructions in them. With the sun and diffraction lenses you have the same way of manipulating holographic images.

MONDAY: What attracted you about diffraction grading?

PETHICK: The nice thing about diffraction grading was that it was being mass-produced, manufactured. Diffraction grading is a plastic film milled with grooves, like a phonograph record. The grooves are optically calculated to break up white light into colour, prisms. The material is often mirror-backed and sends out rich and unpredictable colour phenomena. When I was doing holography you could go to a store and buy it and make art out of it. Nowadays you can do the same with holography.

Spectroclad is a kind of mass-produced spectral hologram and you can use it to get spectral colour, you can just cut it up and use it. The same way as you can use paint. Diffraction grading was used for fishing lures: I got into it before they started using it on the sides of vans. The fishing lures were very beautiful works of art—the beautiful blues and greens, on pieces of stainless steel, like some kind of weird jewelry. The people who make it are playing with a physical phenomenon, reproducing natural effects seen on butterfly wings, feathers and fish scales. They are the same people who have been making 3-D postcards.

When I was doing holography I was also doing a lot with fresnel lenses, in the sense of cutting them up and re-assembling them. Fresnel lenses are known as the clear plastic discs popular on our rear windows, wide angle lenses which enable one to "look around corners". They are also used in an optical way to organize light coherently. This type of lens is used in lighthouses and for theatre lighting. I was very interested in playing with the dimensionality of the things—from two-dimensional to three-dimensional. And mirrors. When I was doing holography sometimes I'd have to clean off a mirror when I needed a piece of optical glass. I'd clean off the scratched mirrors with nitric acid. I remember seeing the first drop of nitric acid—suddenly it was clear—mirror clear. And that change seemed very dimensional.

MONDAY: So the viewer of one of your pieces recognizes himself in the mirror.

PETHICK: And rather than looking at the piece they must look through it, as with the holographic model. The viewer's eye moves back and forth through the planes focusing at different focal lengths. The reflected light and spectral colours shine out and surround the viewer.

The observer becomes part of the sculpture. The light bouncing around envelops the spectator. As in physics, the observer is no longer separate from the experiment.

MONDAY: I heard it said "Petrick may be a good artist but he's really a master at butcher carving."

PETHICK: Bathtub caulking is really silicone sealer. It's amazing. That's what I used to hold glass together. And it does so well that it will break down before it will pull off the glass. So, obviously, if you want to get things out of glass the way to do it is to select some way of using silicone. It's like rubber so, providing you have a layer of silicone between the layers of glass, you have some flexibility. Of course, glass is very flexible.
by rubbing it with steel wool, you get a bright reflection, a line of light shining off it. So it's nice to use for framing pictures. The light line moves with the spectator. It's not so precise as a square edge. And aluminium is lightweight. You can cut it with a knife, work it with hand tools. It doesn't rust, and it's strong for its weight.

MONDAY: And it's supplied free of charge by the Hornby Island Dump. Like the baked enamel panels from dismantled kitchen appliances.

PETHICK: Enamel is a primary and wonderful light-reflecting material. The white is not a pigment so much as real light, absorbed and reflected by a surface which is really glass. When you see cloisonne or enamels the colours are beautiful because they're not just pigment but light colours. There is a relationship between plastic and enamel in that the colour is through the whole material. Plastic has the same qualities of partial absorption and transmission of light as enamels do.

MONDAY: So enamels are a kind of baked-on glass.

PETHICK: Yes— these panels are glass canvasses, which are perfect for using with silicone. Because silicone is glass. Stones are the same, to a degree. And ceramic— anything ceramic which is glazed will hold with silicone.

MONDAY: Beyond the materials themselves, you have many ways at hand to energize the space around your works.

PETHICK: I've thought of using sound with the sculptures. But silence has a lot to do with separating a work from the rest of the world. Or glass boxes. A display case takes the most intimate personal objects and gives them a whole other realm.

Special lighting and separateness are good showmanship. And good showmanship has a lot to do with religion. Those little alters you see in Europe— whatever relic is there, it's authenticating religion. Maybe the "third hand of St. Somebody" they put it in a box and the local handyman does the lighting. And awkward presentation works in its favour, to authenticate it, so that you believe in the idea. All the snakeweed salesman know about that.

MONDAY: One of your glass boxes has a model of St. Theresa inside. Why. St. Theresa?

PETHICK: Did you know there were two St. Theresa? The first, the one I picked, had the first "home for wayward women", and also she is the patron saint of thieves. And then there's Bernini's masterpiece...

PETHICK: It seemed to go along with the immaculate conception and all that.

MONDAY: The subjects of your work, the content, are exceptionally diverse. The Venus of Willendorf made of hundreds of lightbulbs. The lighthouse which attracts the storm. Camille Pissaro working outdoors at an easel with shells. Sir Hans Newton's Cathedral. Baconian's nightmare. Is there some large theme which engages you throughout all these pieces?

PETHICK: I've been working with the disparities. People are led to believe that there is a disunity within the self. There is a psychological and philosophical acceptance in western philosophy that you need to be divided or you're not really aware of yourself. There is supposed to be a separation between the being and how it is recognized. At some point I suddenly felt that it was all a plot, in the sense that philosophy, from Greek times, separated mythos and logos. Reality had to be abstracted into language. And language completely constructs the person. No longer was language used as communication, but rather for communicative difference between simple conversation and axe-grinding.

It seemed to me this disparity was maybe a plot. The dual thing has been nurtured constantly since the 14th century. It's been very beneficial to church and state. And, in the last few years people have been paying a lot of money to get someone to tell them that you really have more than one person inside yourself and you've got to live with it. This is instead of saying "of course you start off with being 85,000 different people, but what does it matter? It's all within the same skin."

The whole idea of that divisional system is just bullshit to keep you from recognizing a certain potential. It is a maintained disparity, really. But there is no disparity. Everyone is unified. Philosophy and everything comes out of this dual model-making. And this comes out of language, basically. So I'm following it through myself, playing with my own alphabet of ideas, bringing disparate notions together and trying to effect a reconciliation.
How Herbert Siebner came to Victoria from post-war Berlin with $3 in his pocket—and still refused to behave or get a straight job

By ROBERT AMOS

BEING AN ARTIST IS A BAD JOKE

T HIS YEAR everyone's thoughts have turned to economic survival. Times are especially difficult in the arts. Sales have dried up, Government funding won't cover the rent, and there's not a trend in sight. It's all a bit daunting to young artists. And so I asked a senior artist what it all means.

Herbert Siebner has learned by long experience that life for the artist is unpredictable. He was born in Berlin in 1925. Germany, Politics and warfare made irreversible changes in his teenage years. After studying at the Berlin Academy from 1946 to 1949, he came to Canada in 1953. There he found he had to educate Victoria so he could make a career for himself as a "modern" artist in this town. Faced with impossible situations again and again, he never wavered in his dedication to painting. Over the years both success and sorrow have come his way. He seems always to have been surrounded by philistines, in 1964-53 as well as in 1946-49.

And yet he has accepted changing fortunes as the lot of an artist—"I never mind going up and down," he says. In 28 years as a painter he has had only one show in the air. He received numerous government grants and has been elected president of the group of Victoria artists, the Linnern. Though an honorary citizen of Victoria, Siebner considers it a very badly designed city, just one step short of Disneyland. He has never lost his sense of humour. And painting has not soured his art. Perhaps he can draw strength from the dedication of this artist who is committed to his work, come what may. The struggle continues.

MONDAY: What was it like in Berlin after the war?

SIEBNER: From 1946 to 1949 I was studying and no one had anything. Of the students, no one was working. Naturally it was a very idealistic society amongst us because you either had a sense of humour, you had, you had intelligence or you had a bad character or whatever. That was all.

I came, actually, from a very wealthy home. We had a collection of various art. But when I was 17 I lost everything and after the war we had to move out of the country. So having been born into a very secure and sheltered society, even if I had absolutely nothing I never feel poor.

There were 10,000 artists in Berlin. One was sitting on top of the other. One tried to snatch the patron away from the other.

MONDAY: Were you living in a tiny room somewhere?

SIEBNER: My first place I had called my own was about six by 10 feet. Large paintings, and everything, were hiding under my little soles. There was also a tiny little table. Later on I was quite fortunate, because Berlin was almost three quarters bombed out. You couldn't find any rooms. A friend and I bought a studio through another friend—well, it was a half bombed out house but it was a large area, except it was extremely cold—no heating, no furniture, nothing. It was 1947-8, when the air-bridge was in Berlin. MONDAY: How did you pay the rent?

SIEBNER: I was still a student then. Everyone was selling something on the black market. At any time I sold some cigarettes or some beer or anything, I smoked or drank the whole lot and it was gone. Ah, they were turbulent times. Particularly at this time you could not survive on the ration of whatever was given to you. What you got you could only carry in your hand. For a whole day—three slices of bread, a piece of cheese, an even smaller piece of meat, butter or margarine like this (sugar) cube and that was all.

The currency right after the war was American cigarettes. A cigarette was valued at 12 marks. So I was sketching a soldier in the park in a portrait gallery. He asked me, "you want sell me an eight cigarette?" I said, "easy." That was one of my first sales—1945, eight cigarettes.

But there were 10,000 artists in Berlin. One was sitting on top of the other. One tried to snatch the patron away from the other one. Oh, it was hard to survive, but I never took life too seriously, though I was serious when I was alone.

And we were very economical. Hannelore was the ideal person because she never complained. She was a dancer. She was used to an artistic background in life, but she had always sympathy and never demanded, you know, that I become serious and work. If she ever bought a little thing, that was fine; next day was nothing. And then, having many friends, they always came, they bought something or I did a little sketch for supper. This way we existed.

SIEBNER in Berlin in 1951 (right), and now: What is fame? Life is always going up and down

"If people like to visit us and come to admire our furniture, they can go to hell."

MONDAY: What circumstances made it possible for you to immigrate to Canada?

SIEBNER: Hannelore's sister lived in Victoria and she described the place. There was only one other artist here, a Czechoslovakian artist, Jan Zach. So I sold it sounds like heaven, after living in a city with 10,000 artists standing around.

Another thing was very important. I could not teach in Germany. I had completed my studies and everything was fine, but in order to protect the older generation, there was a minimum age for teaching—35 years. I was 29 when I immigrated and I had the chance to teach here.

So we came out. I think we had about $3 between us when we finally arrived.

And the first two years were very hard because, you know, first of all the language, then entirely different customs. Coming from such a western city like Berlin it was very difficult entering Victoria—Victoria really was Victorian. I mean, if you met a person at a party you were not allowed to talk to him. You had to be properly introduced, or they didn't answer. Very strange. The first two and a half years were very turbulent.

MONDAY: What was the artistic status quo then?

SIEBNER: Only flower painters. Only hobby painters. I was teaching at the Art College and then we had some disagreement. Idiotic. So I quit, and rented a little house on Oaklands and all my students followed. That was how I met Melly Privett, Ann Kipling and Michael Morris and so on.

MONDAY: The teaching paid the rent. How about exhibitions and sales?

SIEBNER: I had the first student show in 1956 at the Gallery (Art Gallery of Greater Victoria) but for sales, I would say I sold my little sketches for about $1. Actually in 1953 I started painting. The prints were even less, sometimes $2 a print. But $2 lasted you. It was fantastic... particularly when you were unemployed.

At one of the shows there was a painting that Molly Privett bought for $450, an enormous sum then. Even later (1962-3) we had $4,500 from Canada Council to stay over one year in Europe.

MONDAY: In Canada did you take employment other than teaching and painting?

SIEBNER: No. I never did this, because to me "work" is the only four-letter word I know. You have to do something which you normally wouldn't do, just to earn money, for somebody else. Even teaching, I could have been hired at the University of Washington or even UBC but for me it's a prison. I hired myself out as a guest lecturer. That's fine, but otherwise...

The price of security is that you have to give up your freedom in exchange. And to behave. You know I cannot behave. If I am teaching I give all my joy, sympathy, whatever to the students. But sitting among the faculty members— I hated this always, you are the father-son complex.

Art cannot be taught. Neither can you really learn it. You can learn technique, style, history. That's all.

MONDAY: Are there any of your former students that give you something to smile about?

SIEBNER: Ann Kipling—naturally she has developed in her own way. I would say I was only an early influence to anyone. Even Flemming (Jorgensen), Or Michael Morris. Nila Forrest and so on. I encouraged them more than I led them in a style. Actually the only thing you can really do is to make something up in someone so he becomes not only dedicated but he can find a joy in discovering something—that all you can really do.

MONDAY: Have you seen a time when the artists came together more for art's sake, for art' sake, for general purposes?

SIEBNER: Not really. We tried it—we had the Paint Group and later the Linnern. Bob de Castro, Circimara, Elza Mayhew and Nila Forrest and so on. You can do it as a spur of the moment thing. When we were less started Linnern, Max Bates came and we said together you cannot organize artists, anyhow. How much have they really in common?

The most idiotic thing here is, once you form a group, you need a president, a treasurer, a secretary. You have to have two lawyers. It's completely insane.

MONDAY: In the early 1970's you were quite a famous artist in Victoria but you now don't seem to be so popular. Does this make any difference to you?

SIEBNER: I only see myself strictly as an individual artist. What is fame? What is substance? If I have altogether maybe done 10 good works (which I doubt I have) it's the only thing which is really there. It's honesty towards yourself. Success! I have to repay myself! Live a life like Toni Ousley! For me it's the exact opposite of what I really feel. Living in a modernistic society people judge you only by this.

Art is not for sale, really, and you should not sell yourself.

MONDAY: Art seems to be difficult, or almost impossible career.

SIEBNER: To me life is like a bad movie. I never know when I'm supposed to be stepping in or stepping out.

I never mind going up and down. Most people have to hope in the illusion of always going up. It's idiotic. Right from the beginning, I was always used to the adventure of being an artist. You know, for years and years we never had a bank account but we always paid cash. So we were never in debt, even today. So many German families, or other immigrants, moved in and bought everything new. They wanted to show off. I said, "If people like to visit us, if they come to admire our furniture, they can go to hell."

I never expected too much. An artist was always—and still is today in Germany, unless you are a professor—a bad joke. Even my family was always hiding me, I was a black sheep. Every time I was looking to be a standard merchant. Then it stopped. Or scientific. But art? Don't mention it. You should be sent away.

MONDAY MAGAZINE—OCT. 20-NOV. 4, 1972
Art in the Alley

When I first saw it I thought, 'what the hell?' but later I came back, and it came to me. Some ordinary guy was explaining to his wife how Ted Polkinghorne's ragged black canvases had gripped him, 'A thunderstorm.' I get it, a thunderstorm!

He was talking about last weekend's Alley Art event in Waddington Alley, between Johnson and Yates. Robert Kidd's scout-staff arch spans Waddington Alley, easily creating the 'sence of place' which many modern artists try so hard to create in galleries. On this sunny weekend afternoon the artists are having a sort of picnic. Baskets of paint, huge panels of colour, plenty of milling about and nothing for sale. The alley was alive. Let that be a tribute to organizer Luis Merino and John Russell.

In the centre of it all Luis Saurez was slapping paint on the iron pipes which made up his quivering cosmic cricket, a large version of the attenuated sculpture he's been making. Phyllis Sorella was painting away on an eight foot square which I hope will soon grace some public space here in Victoria. She pointed out Lance Olsen's painting, 'I've never quite been able to appreciate his art, but Phyllis turned me on to it. Just let the message go- she's dazzled by his range of tone and knowledge of materials.'

Andrew Leene has taken advantage of the architecture of the alley to fit his collage into place. As designer of the windows, 'simple Emanu-El he knows about such things. Under the watchful eye of Pier Group, Liz Scully and Stewart Banks are separately at work on the sidewalk. The lady who does the walking tours for the Hallmark Society was pleased to find a spray of paint on the old bricks - good clean art. Not like the punk and revolution one could have expected. But then, there is already lots of graffiti here behind the Harbour Light.

There seems to be room for every trend, and plenty of good feeling. Probably very few passers-by will be converted to connoisseurs. And it seems unlikely that this energy level could be sustained for a weekly event (though I already await its annual recurrence). Mostly it's a chance for the artists to catch up on what's been happening and keep up a high public profile. As such, it promotes good relations among the labourers of one of Victoria's most important industries - art.

Luis Merino: art for the looking.
First you meet Lily in the foyer. She is a "pleasure pulling boat"—rowboat to you and me—of mid-19th century style, 5 metres long. She is made of cedar, oak, mahogany, ebony, juniper root, sitka spruce, yew, cane, copper, bronze, ivory and gold.

Then you enter the Maltwood Museum.

Martin Segger, director of UVic's Maltwood Museum, has done us all a service in presenting The Cabinet Maker/Designer, an exhibition of 22 Vancouver Island woodworkers. Standard Furniture helped with the design and advertising for this extensive collection of work, chosen by the artists themselves. It's displayed against old Persian carpets, some fantastically worn to muted shades. Katherine Maltwood would have been pleased.

New audiences—for example, middle-aged men—are attracted to the museum, and are allowed to touch things (gently). They kneel down to look up under, to study the joints and respect the joinery. The home handyman or young construction worker is not your usual gallery-goer. But here he is, examining Donald Kreye's frame and panel chest, constructed with blind mortise and tenon joints—a functional object, historically derived design, honest and well-executed carpentry. The Maltwood has never had such a turnout.

There's more: a dining room suite from Tools 'n' Space; a vanity table and bench by Knut Larsen; a 5 by 10 foot teak billiard table from David Peacock; and unusual instruments made with love and imagination by David Pottier. The sounds of Pottier's tuned wooden drum are welcome in the gallery.

The design elements are eclectic, of course. Exotic woods often replace a concern for simple form, but maybe that's because the showier elements were chosen for this display. The "pilot's desk" by Cameron Russell is well-made and imaginative, but the hand-carved propeller drawer-pulls are a bit of misplaced ingenuity. Yet it is this sort of flourish which attracts attention, even more than the beautiful pentagonal wall-cabinet with hand-made hinges from Ken Guenter's shop.

Ed Colin of Hornby Island who, won the "Best in Show" award at the 1981 Vancouver Celebration of Wood Exhibit of the Craftsmen's Association of B.C., is displaying a cabinet for engineering blueprints. The proportions are handsome, and the workmanlike action of the rollfront gives this piece a confident authority.

Laurie Milne of Comox brought a table and a desk. The wood joins up just so at the corners—a test of real craftsmanship. And restraint sets him off as a designer whose work will endure. The long low table is a perfect melody, graceful and modest.

And finally, a talent inexplicable and far beyond the ordinary. It's hard to believe that Gregory Brown was born as recently as 1945, and that he's self-taught. Lily is his boat, and anything I could say would slip off it as the highlights roll along its perfectly formed hull. His display in the gallery is discrete, educational, superb. Beneath a small turned and inlaid box is a reddish wooden stand. Even there, the finish is such that the grain of the wood is transparent, gleaming, flowing like a river of amber. A few of his handmade saws hang behind, calm in their irreducible logic—form perfectly following function. An inlaid drop-leaf table stands finished beside another in process. This seems part of the cabinet-making tradition of the age of periwigs and sedan chairs. Yet here it is, alive and mysterious. A craftsman this good has no need for artifice. Gregory Brown is an important cultural property.

This exhibition will have a salutary effect on all who make things. It's full of ideas, and a display of such good work sets high standards. All the contributors' addresses and other contact numbers are listed in Morriss Printers' catalogue, a steal at $6.95. It can't help but encourage the patronage of local woodworkers.

HOW VICTORIA CITY HALL IS SAVING YOU MONEY
How do you judge a painting? Judge it by its faithfulness to the model, a model you know. Judge it by the thrill of recognition when you see it "in the flesh" (the real thing is the reproduction). Judge it for visual richness, rich tone and glowing light when seen in a gallery full of other paintings. Judge it by the unleashed intensity of colour, broadly brushed in rhyt' felt deep within the artist. Judge... Emily Carr’s Sky Paintings by any of these standards and they come up winners.

Emily Carr. Sure, you’ve seen it all before—streamlined trees, copies of totem poles, painted with cheap materials. The colours are often murky or just too green. If her forest interior subjects leave you feeling “seen one, seen ‘em all”, this show is different. The sky paintings are light-coloured abstracts, quite modern and each one unique. They are, in my opinion, the best of Emily Carr.

How do they fit into Emily’s development as an artist? After her schooling, she painted quasi-anthropological studies of totems, art with a historical purpose. Then she fell under the influence of Lawren Harris and his theosophy, painting the static geometric matrices which underly forest and sky. Following this she found new freedom expressing the living rhythms of the natural world through her powerful calligraphy. This last phase is vigorous, impelled by Carr’s approaching illness and old age. These great late paintings are driven by what Dylan Thom-as called “the force which through the green fuse drives the flowers”.

“I woke up this morning with ‘unity of movement’ in a picture strong in my mind. I believe that Van Gogh had that idea... The spirit must be felt so intensely that it has power to call others in passing, for it must pass, not stop in the picture but be perpetually moving through, carrying on and inducing a thirst for more and a desire to rise.”

Emily Carr,

_Hundreds and Thousands_, p. 138

Years of labour had taught Emily Carr to paint not just the visible forms, but to express her soul. Emily the pantheist found in skies the ultimate subject through which to meet her God. She was an active and avid worshipper of the holy spirit in nature. It was moving on the winds, glowing with light, breadth and majesty in the sky over the Straits of Juan de Fuca.

The sky is a wonderful subject: vast, formless and ever-changing. It allows the artist almost complete freedom of expression. It can be painted in innumerable ways. And what a lot of ways Emily Carr painted it — arching, dappled, swooping; breezy, still; dull, deep or rapturous — it is more difficult than we think to make planes of paint imitate charged blue emptiness. In some of her works the skies are experimental, organized to give halos of visible spirit to the trees. But when Emily drops the props, those stage-struck spar trees, and gives us just the sky and its reflection in the straits, her essential and inspired genius is there for us to see.

Genius? Inspired? It’s going to be hard to impress Victorians with those claims. We’ve been so often disappointed by the province’s Emily Carr Gallery on Wharf Street, its terrible selection of art and overdone decor, and by musicals and window displays which might not have amused the artist herself. Finally, we’ve been uninspired by the absurdly high-priced scraps which art dealers drag out of her past. Haven’t we seen enough?

Not until we’ve seen the skies. The rippling, heavenly inspired skies. Leave out the trees and stumps, the logging and the sand pits. Even leave out half the paintings in this show. Leave only the skies painted with an intense love that can change a little blue streak into all the Olympian distance — love that can put the angels in the heavens and bid them sing.

In the end I am asking you to go and see just one painting. It’s called Sky. It’s the one without a frame and it is on loan from the National Gallery of Canada. It’s a masterpiece, the most beautiful painting ever made in Victoria.

Our thanks to Ian Thom for bringing this (and so much else) to the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria.

APPLES AND ORANGES

I strongly disagree with Robert Amos's comments in "Leave only the skies" (Monday, August 26-Sept.1). In a review of the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria's exhibit of Emily Carr's sky paintings, Amos states: "Genius? Inspired? It's going to be hard to impress Victorians with those claims. We've so often been disappointed by the province's Emily Carr Gallery, its terrible selection of art and overdone decor."

The Emily Carr Gallery is part of the provincial archives of B.C. and as such is primarily concerned with documentation. To quote eminent Canadian archivist Hugh Taylor: "Better material should gravitate towards galleries, not to archives, and rightly so." Therefore, Carr's works of genius and inspiration belong in the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria.

The Emily Carr Gallery, however, helps the viewer to better understand sky paintings, by providing some of the context for Carr's works. Thus, the Carr Gallery fulfills its function and is a welcome extension of the provincial archives of B.C. A strong feeling of our history and identity is provided for the citizens of Victoria as well as the many interested visitors.

As for "overdone decor", that is a matter of personal taste.

A "WEAK DISMISSAL"

The review of sky paintings by Robert Amos ("Leave only the skies," Monday, Aug. 27-Sept.2) was a great disappointment. Yes, the Emily Carr exhibit is excellent but the punch of this positive statement is deflated by weak and unfounded negative opinion of the Emily Carr Gallery.

Robert Amos has failed to grasp the purpose of the Emily Carr Gallery and the focus of the current exhibit, which is to present a full range of Carr's talent, tracing the growth and change of her art. It is a retrospective, a general study, which complements and is in turn complemented by the fine detailed exhibit of the sky paintings at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria. The two galleries have an excellent working relationship. Two of the Carr originals in sky paintings were lent to the Art Gallery by the provincial archives, a fact Amos fails to mention.

As far as the weak, off hand dismissal of the Emily Carr Gallery is concerned, Amos stands apart from the vast appreciative group of patrons. The "we've been so often disappointed" is perhaps the royal "we"?

ANGER

VICTORIA'S MAGAZINE
VOL. 8, NO. 38, SEPT. 24-30, 1982

CONFESSIONS OF AN ADULT FENCE-PAINTER
ARGARET SHORTER brought her baby. Balancing it on her left hip, she painted right-handed. The paint was in the pram beside her.

The way Jim Lindsay held a spray can and was ping up and down, leaving vapour trails of gold on the wide fence. Artists can be a coy bunch, muttering antic illusions in garrets. But here they were on the site—at the corner of Fort and Quadra—for the great fence paint-in. Once upon a time that wall was a bit blue blight, home of the self-proclaimed "graffiti in convention", urging us to do the spin rite and the whale. Now it is decorated with thirty-odd saus. The artists gave their own materials and countless hours of work, providing the city with a constant show, ming to night, for seven days.

l just people were genuinely happy to see someone at last. In our culture, workers and makers are generally loners—visitors must report to the office, no customers and the counter; "we don't make them here but we do order one for you." Yet people love to watch something happen, especially if it involves bright colours and art of chance—can be done? Observing Victoria's artists were full of compliments.

l day Sunday Sept. 19 there were no fewer than 200 walk superintendent students at a time, and for a while one lane of Fort St. was blocked off by bodies. Add this to the thousands of drivers who go up the road every day and you get some idea of the audience this fence is giving to Victoria's artists.

Of course, just as men don't eat quiche, so they don't understand art. "You call that art?", "My kid could have done that." "They spend our tax money on that?" They say. There are things one viewer says to another to establish the solidarity of the philistines. One lady said her Alsatian could do better. I say bring him on. Another man wanted to know who paid me. I told him I was an artist working for love. He thought that was some sort of joke: people habitually ask me if I am an artist. Real artists only live in Paris, or in magazines.

Kids hang out, like energy vampires getting a contact high. Idiots and indigents lure the street artist into conversation to validate their perceptions. Media bull shows up with tape recorders, video cameras, note pads and Polaroids. Something is definitely happening.

The artists came to record their visions. Some—Iutarte, Vial—took a workmanlike approach. They came and executed bold flat designs and left after a day or two. Others—Costa, Leone—are painters used to the big scale, and set about with confidence born of experience. But others found themselves in for a very long haul, trying to scale up little oil paintings onto the rugged plywood surface in the bright sunlight. Pliers to pull out staples were in demand and Stewart Brand's sunhat looked like a wise idea. Painting a 4x8 foot panel is not as easy as it seems.

Linda Proe said she almost chickened out. Was it the public that spooked her? No, it was the other artists. Painting among one's peers becomes performance art, daunting indeed: But so good for us. The studio secrets— Merino's purple, Serota's underpainting—were out, and generously shared. As were stools and tools. The artists met one another, recognized common goals and developed a mutual respect to replace the insular self-protection of the garret-bound. And they felt, perhaps for the first time, the true public reaction to their work.

Many of these artists and a number of others will have another chance to hear first-hand reaction when the next public panel painting venture starts Saturday, Sept. 25 on the Inner Harbour walkway below the Empress Hotel.

The Fort St. panels were put up in the first place to hide a vacant construction site, left by the landowner 12 years ago when his attempt to put up a twin to View Towers was opposed by the city. Landowner George Muyle has finally bowed to pressure from the city to at least clean up the lot behind the fence. The two panels removed to do this have now been replaced.

Vote for your favourite Island Blueprint has put up merchandise certificates for first ($350), second ($150), and third place ($50). Ballots are available at Monday, 823 Broughton Street (until 5 pm Friday) or at Island Blueprint, corner of Fort and Quadra, (until 2 pm Saturday), or in last week's issue of Monday. Ballots must be delivered to Island Blueprint by 2 pm Saturday or to Monday (use the mail slot) by 4 pm Sept. 26. The winners will be announced in the next issue of Monday.
CITY FAIR

RHYTHMS IN THE SOUNDSCAPE

The voices of a city: Greek yells, exhaust vents, and glad tidings from the cathedrals

By MARK HAMMOND

George Cacos yells an order to his brothers Peter and John, sometimes in Greek, more often in English. Comments about rowdy customers are always in Greek.

An instructor calls out a rhythm: the percussion student plays paradiddle, paradiddle, rim-shot. It's slow, not reverential, and he calls for it again. Then twice more.

The taxi radio crackles like the famous eraser; drivers stick close to one another, carrying on quiet conversations about how to leave their cars.

W'tcha staring at? Never seen legs before, mister? Paid to talk to a working girl? Laughter, raucous, rises from the small bazaar of hookers near the bank.

These are the alley sounds.

They converge in a courtyard, they amplify one another, and the noise is deafening. The courtyard, really a spray of converging, lies at the heart of the West, Government, Johnson, and Broad block in the centre of town. Here the Cacos brothers manage their Night and Day Restaurant, serving food not yet reviewed in Monday newspaper.

The Falstaff sign is idle, and the dance students in the Duck Building and music students at UVic's learn the first rhythms an ear moved to - "all come from the human pulse, it's where rhythm is born," and the hookers to make a closed tank look busy again.

"No boy, you not go here. This not for you. Goodbye." A slam of the door, and the snapping and clicking mah-jong tiles sound less brilliant.

In the renewed remains of Chinatown, once second only to San Francisco's Barbary Coast and Grant Avenue in size, special sounds pattern the street.

There are restaurants, of course: woks banging, fantastically musical voices demanding pork and egg and beans in an endless note-fall of melisma and urgency, with water taps running everywhere, and the loud snatch of Cantonese conversation. Quiet Chinese restaurants are rare and no fun.

There is the gambling, too. In the '50s, before the shake-up and firings in the city police, before the Archer report looked at these habits, Chinatown gambling was big business. Today it's more discreet, and doors slam in the face of unrecognized visitors.

The martial arts schools excite the yells of tradition-oriented kids, and the Dragon Dancers, all their stupid drums, and the singing lessons at the Chinese Public School - all this records and reflects Chinatown vigorous again. If only the Gate of Harmonious Interest could sing its ornaments.

Quadra Street, from Glad Tidings at the arena to Christ Church at Pioneer Square, is a kind of church chorus alley in our town. There are more than 130 choirs in Victoria. Most are religious. For many years - no one can remember when this wasn't the case - they have all rehearsed on Thursday evenings.

Walk Quadra on such an evening.

Hear the revitalisation and 20th century brass at Glad Tidings Pentecostal - a splendid auditorium, electric guitars, and the yells of Jerry Lee Lewis attack on the keyboards. At First Baptist, it's much quieter: old voices, deeply meant; old hymns, deeply learned, the music of ancient conviction. Over in First United, the traditions of Roberts Wood sing on, and the large choir moves easily from anthem to anthem. Further down at St John the Divine, the voice of the great organ in Victoria can be heard. At Pandora's intersection, the Metropolitian and Central Baptist Churchs compete for traffic attention.

Up the hill at Christ Church, choirmaster and organist Norman Hurlie enjoys the finest instrument and most curious acoustics in the city. He's moving the chorus back to professional standards, and his urgent and directing tenor carries over every other voice.

Have you heard the CNIB buzzers on Blanshard? They advise the blind when it's safe to cross over. Have you ever heard the Johnson Street bridge siren? It's wonderfully quiet. And do you remember the old 9 pm curfew whistle? There is a Victoria that lives for the ear alone. There are city sounds that define and move us in ways we cannot guess, the city subliminally advertising itself.
FROM A FORTRESS TO A HOME

Interior design is more than a few slip covers and end tables

Y ou're thinking about doing over the living room. Architectural Digest and Decorman have been turning up on all the best coffee tables and they're talking up post-modern classicism. What's post-modern classicism? And what's in fashion in Victoria?

Interior designers in Victoria want to erase the timeless look that is never seen. They say their customers don't want a trendy image, but just a familiar, comfortable domain. There are heirlooms and personal preferences to be considered, and it's not up to the interior designer to impose his or her taste on the customer, even if he or she can't afford the latest materials and designs available. However, we'll take a look at the trend fashionable styles.

What is this post-modern classicism? Geometric spaces picked out in the "new colours" they used to be called pastels, into this spacious minimalism the designer will add recycled or copied architectural elements of a charming and eclectic variety: cornices, columns, Italian arches, quotes from Palladio and Inigo Jones. "It's not a new style for me," says Mike Cullen of North Park Designs (1049 North Park, 381-3422). "I've been building eclectically all my life."

Most other designers in Victoria say post-modernism is unlikely to have such effect on residential interiors in Victoria. We see High Fashion in restaurants and clubs, but at home our tastes have been shaped by our old country background of antiques and heirlooms. Victoria's attitudes and location make us more suited to the current pervasive interest in "Oriental" as a fashion style. The opening of China to the west a few years ago brought with it a renewed interest in Chinonnerie (a taste which already captured Europe's heart in 1700 and continued through Queen Victoria's reign), and today many Oriental styles are available in Victoria stores. Chinonnerie carpets have become the fashion floor-covering. "We can send a painted sketch to their factory and the Chinese send us a sample, computer dyed and cut to our design, in just a few weeks," says Cameron Woodward-Ewen of Design Associates (1417 Strathcona, 593-2344). And to lend weight to his statement he showed me three 7.5 square metre carpet samples, each dyed in three different designer colours.

Oriental, or any other style, is achieved by use of accent items featured in an otherwise neutral room. Interior designers' showrooms stock fascinating furniture, paintings and objets d'art which have been brought from the markets of the Far East. At Sterling McBean Interiors (710 Broughton St., 383-3037) silk pillow covers from Thailand and batik cotton from Indonesia are ready for the home decorator to work with. They also have a selection of finish Japanese chests of drawers which are now a highly sought after furnishing item. Ann Wilson of Sterling McBean was quick to tell me that the shop has no interior designer, though advice is readily available. Rather, this is a shop where the interior designer can shop. A big part of interior design is knowing what's on the market and where to find it at the best price.

Furniture shops are well aware of the popularity of the Oriental style. Both American and Canadian manufacturers are accentuating the horizontal lines and brass fittings which bring a touch of the east to furniture scaled for Canadian living. And fabrics to cover traditional furniture shapes are increasingly patterned and printed with oriental motifs. The rise in price of oil-based vinyl wallcoverings has made the elegant grass cloth papers of Asia a better bargain than ever. These wall coverings include strips of bamboo or knotted straw loosely woven together and mounted on papers such as exotic tea-chest gold.

At Standard Furniture (737 Yates, 382-5111), Ann Creighton is able to show sofas in lovely chintzes or handsome brocades in styles other than Oriental. The classics of interior design are still with us: French provincial, American colonial, the clean lines of the International style. There are reminders of decorating styles which have come and gone—the Spanish look of the early sixties, or the fringes and furbelows of Victorian taste. Creighton presents extensive lines by famous designers, like Laura Ashley, which are co-ordinated from carpet, fabric, wallpaper and right on to table napkins and pillow slips. Her expertise is available through Standard's Design Studio, usually at no cost to their customers.

Before you get any ideas about how easy it is to pick a style and redesign your living space, remember there's no South of it than choosing a few slipcovers and end tables. Some of the effects an interior designer works with are almost subliminal. Not only the design of the carpet but its thickness has a subtle effect on your mood. Therefore, choosing your fabrics carefully is a must.
response. The quality and location of lighting is an area in which a professional designer can really score points over an amateur. The flow of a room, its traffic pattern, is often best understood by a professional. No longer does furniture have to back up to the wall in a succession of tiny rooms. Numerous conversation areas are encouraged, and other spaces centre on the piano or television: areas make separate by plants or glass brick walls. There are many elements on the designer's palette.

Wall treatments often extend beyond paint and paper. Your interior designer is happy to act as contractor, designing and ordering wall units from local cabinet makers. He can invent a new fire-place or discover an old one, and create window treatments with a full knowledge of what's on the market, tempered with his client's needs and lifestyle.

Our notions of residential design are undergoing transformation. Until just a few years back the home was a fortress against the elements, divided and subdivided on a grid pattern. Often it seemed all the living went on in the kitchen, and the living room was reserved for Christmas and funerals. Our modern leisure culture and the abundance of space in the suburbs has brought about the ranch style, the rec room and the casual convenience of the open plan. Now, with the advent of new materials—thermopane windows, teflon coated upholstery and fade-resistant fabric dyes—our interiorors can open up to embrace the out-of-doors. Thus the interior designer's job begins to expand into the architect's realm, to greenhouse windows, patio, sunporches—the intersection of the outside and inside of the residence. The transition from fortress to an environmentally sympathetic home has been slow. It is the job of the interior designer to help us shape our old-fashioned or inconvenient residences to modern living styles.

And what is an interior designer? If we're going to get an outsider help us spend a lot of money, we should know who that person is. The manager of Pacific Office Interiors (1524 Fort, 592-8822) echoed many people's prejudices when he jokingly referred to the residential specialists as "inferior decorators". He himself sells office furniture exclusively and makes no bones about being a vendor, a merchant, "decorator" is a name generally reserved for those whose talents are limited to paint, wallpaper and upholstery choices, often a euphemism for "house painter" or "furniture salesman".

Interior designers are a cut above. In Canada there are 16 colleges (among them Camosun College) and one university with interior design courses. The four-year course at the University of Manitoba is taught through the faculty of architecture. Graduates of such courses can draft mechanical drawings for all phases of construction and wiring of their projects, and specialize in some particular area of the field—perhaps commercial or office design, residential or institutional interiors. Some come to be associated with furniture shops, some with architects' offices, and many are in private practice. Of course, a few live up to the stereotype, draping yards of fabric hither and yon and convincing Mrs. Bucks that everything will look "just divine". But more likely you'll find a well-trained and conscientious professional concerned with making your home or work-space more pleasant, efficient and comfortable.

Interior designers have professional organizations which require special examinations for admission. Jeannette Taylor (1150 Douglas, 382-7141), whose studio is located in Eaton's home furnishings department, is a member of the Interior Design Institute (IDI). Glenn Oliphant of Design Associates belongs to The American Society of Interior Designers (ASID). Such certification is not necessary, but it lets you know that you're dealing with an ethical professional.

How do interior designers work? On the low end of the scale, he or she may be consultant to a furniture store. When purchasing a major item—and remember, a sofa can easily cost $5,000—the services of the consultant are available at no cost (if you go through with the purchase) to help you sort out the correct style or upholstery from literally thousands of possibilities. The consul-

The search for gracious design: the nouveau riche taste needs educating boards in their studios just out of sight. But up front is usually a comfortable room for meeting clients, showing off their skill, and displaying some of the well-chosen accessories in stock. Harold Tweten's Interiors (1608 Fort St., 382-9253) has a special shop for commercial customers, and the front room is like a superb executive office, its casual elegance highlighted by a Walter Phillips print. Well-chosen original paintings mark a room with personality and a sense of richness once available only to the wealthy. Design Associates is appealing to the collector, featuring Burmese lacquer, Thai carving and Japanese paintings, simply displayed in glass front cabinets with concealed indirect lighting. North Park Designs have a gallery showroom to display the work of local artists, always in good taste.

Back near the drawing table, a veritable library of sample books bring the merchandise of the world within arms' reach. Carpets and drapes, paint and paper of course; but also Italian tiles, chair-caning and a variety of bricks are close at hand. With the customer's needs in mind a presentation evolves. Architectural drawings, floorplan and elevation, and more interpretive sketches accompany swatches of all sorts of materials. Sometimes a wall panel will be built, showing a complete width of wallpaper, wainscotting, baseboard and cornice, with upholstery samples attached.

It's up to the designer to contract and supervise constructions and installations. His planning, market research, on-site visits and consultations add up to a lot of time and attention. Yet the eventual cost is about the same as if the customer had purchased the components himself and paid the retail price. The designer makes his income between wholesale and retail price and a good designer can save a lot of time and money by his knowledge of good workers and suppliers. He can assure that the work is done on time and with a minimum of disturbance. For jobs where more time and fewer materials are used, a consulting fee is charged. So, getting involved with an interior designer is not expensive - he will work within your budget and may save you costly mistakes.

If you have money to spend and want to plan for best results, designers can deliver the "timeless" quality - decor that doesn't date. A... that quality can be expensive. At the high end, designers are cunning magicians capable of creating spaces with a special, almost sacred aura - the board room, the reception hall, the formal dining room. Designers are technicians for ritual spaces. They're a sophisticated art, unobtrusive but profound in its implications. Yet the interior designer wants to amend this image of "carriage trade only".

Good design is accessible to everyone, and those who need it most are the middle-income groups, the nouveau rich whose taste needs education. Their homes may be tools of social leverage, to entertain the boss or present the correct image to associates. These rarely admitted but very real social purposes of the environment can be well served by an interior designer. He can help the young and upcoming go beyond the inherited taste for Woonco Poco.

Perhaps more important is the benefit a well-ordered home can be to those who live in it. Better layout planning saves steps. Colour coordination and lighting enhance mood. A coherent plan for furnishings is more economical. A home which is well-designed can reflect the aspirations of its inhabitants, giving reality to things the hardworking person dreams of but has perhaps neither the time nor expertise to achieve.

And what is there for the average person? Keith Armitage, a freelance designer, told me "the best deal is the consultation fee". It may seem a bit steep at $50 per hour, but to have a few hours of the designer's advice is well worth it. He can put you in touch with a larger pattern for living, thinking of your home as a complete, designed unit. He can create themes for colour and furnishings which are in tune with the times, and in tune with the space from the specialist point of view. After that, it's up to you to make the changes in your home, but the $150 or so is money well spent.

Who said what when 31
With a trend of shorter exhibits, some of the most important art shows can't be reviewed before they're past. And the well-publicized artists are often left out in lieu of informing the public of the lesser known artists. Here those imbalances are slightly redressed.

Victoria's most famous artist, Canada's most popular artist, the wealthiest artist in the west, and the local best seller: they all ad show here in the past four weeks. How many did you see?

Fenwick Lansdowne is probably the most famous artist living in Victoria. He tells his utterly accurate ornithologies through a gallery in London, England, though he paints them here. His new portfolio of reproductions, "The Birds of Hong Kong", has just come out and went on show for less than a week (Crystal Garden gallery, 707 Douglas, October 7-13). The gallery was gorgeously done up, with real birds and cyclamen. But the pictures were just the usual photo-reproductions of Lansdowne water colours, served up in an oriental red folder big enough to use as a coffee table. Not a real painting in sight. Fortunately, this shortcoming has been recently redressed. Now on display is a large oil of herring gulls. It's not a new work, but it's a beauty. Perhaps if someone buys it we'll see more of the real thing. After all, it's only $42,000.

Robert Bateman, at the moment, is Canada's most popular painter. The Marshall Gallery (1636 Cedar Hill Cross Road, October 16-23) put on a show featuring lots of pricey Bateman reproductions as well as half a dozen birds and animals painted in acrylics. Bateman combines a strong compositional sense with the finicky precision animal art lovers love. Unlike Lansdowne, Bateman places his subjects in the landscape. Rocks, mist and floating bull kelp are major elements in his picture of herring gulls, while Lansdowne needs just a few barnacles. Bateman combines sure technique with imagination to make work that pleases both naturalists and aesthetes. There is no reason (except "collectibility") why reproductions should cost many hundreds of dollars; but if they are sufficient pretext to bring his "price available on request" paintings here, I won't complain.

Bateman seems to be the year's most popular artist. Do you remember the million dollar man of the year before? Assumptions and prejudices get in the way of our appreciation of such a character. If Toni Onley (Kyle's Gallery, 1545 Fort, until November 5) was just another painter, if his every sketch did not cost $1,600, then perhaps our sympathies would be more on his side. There is much to admire in his minimal mists and mountains. The gentle graduation of a few tones captures shifting light, glowing through the damp atmospheres we know only too well. And his broad brush traces are as close to zen as landscape painting can be. We have accepted his vision of this coast as a valuable symbol, but it is in danger of becoming a cliche. Of course, it took Onley years to develop this style, but it seems quick and easy now. Perhaps those who wanted an Onley painting already have one, for sales were few.

Harry Heine (Leafhill Gallery, 45 Bastion Square, Oct. 2-9) is a former commercial artist and has his eye firmly fixed on the main chance. "Fishboats and other ships of the Pacific in water colour" describes almost every picture. And they were snapped up on opening night, almost every one. Heine's ship drawing is crisp and adequate, but his Payne's grey or indigo mists are the dominant feature. His hundreds of followers would do well to study the bold, graphic underpinnings of his wave forms and the shifting, pearly light which plays across the boats. He's hit a resonant chord, he paints with ease and confidence, and he gives the illusion of value for money. No wonder he's Victoria's best seller.

That's the high end of art in town: safe bets, settled styles, and not too many sales. This year the money is made on short exhibitions, an established public image and "limited edition" reproductions. Who's next for stardom?

Max Maynard
(1903-1982)

ARTIST MAX Maynard was born in India in 1903 and came to Canada in 1912. As a young man in Victoria he was well-known as an associate of Jack Shadbolt. During the 1930s those two frequented the studio of Emily Carr. Her influence helped to shape Maynard's style, emphasizing the sweeping natural forms of the British Columbia forest and coast.

In 1931 his paintings were displayed in the National Gallery of Canada. But most notable was his organization of the Modern Room at Victoria's Island Arts and Crafts' Society's annual show in 1932. That exhibition was a milestone in Victoria's art history, the first public acknowledgement of "modern art".

His works were often seen in Victoria, Seattle and Vancouver until 1942. Then he became a professor of English literature at the University of New Hampshire. There he continued to paint, developing his oil-on-paper technique, often using black paper for a luminous effect. On retirement he returned to Victoria, his "spiritual home".

In Victoria he was warmly received, not only as an historic figure, but as a talented artist and as a charming man. One-man shows at Kyle's Gallery and at the Burnaby Art Gallery enlarged his public. Despite failing health he continued to paint with unabated skill, most recently working on pieces from his cruise up the Alaska coast.

He is remembered as a romantic, an energetic spirit who rose from his bed in the isolation ward to attend his most recent gallery opening, and who stayed up all night painting. He was looking forward to active participation in the retrospective planned for the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, from May 5 to July 3, 1983.

The new art sales craze

ATELY, MOST of the art sales in Victoria have been at charity auctions. The big daddy of them all, the second annual at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, saw 199 items knocked down in about three hours, grossing almost $35,000. Three weeks before, the University of Victoria’s Inter-Faith Chapel fundraiser, in conjunction with a $100-a-plate dinner and an evening of entertainment, raised $32,000.

But it didn’t stop there. In aid of the Nuclear Disarmament—Referendum, auctioneer-restaurant, wie Siegel and Pagliacci’s brought in $3,600 with a combination dinner-party and charity auction.

And then there was the Western Canada Wildlife Council benefit, which aided seven environmental groups. It was instigated by Robert Bateman’s gift of 10 prints, and included locals like Della Paranich. At the Newcombe Auditorium, the full house came up with about $8,000. Can anyone doubt that this is a most popular way to buy art?

Of course at these events, people are not just buying art—they are supporting their favourite cause and receiving art in return. The works were donated outright to support the Inter-Faith Chapel. The Art Gallery of Greater Victoria (AGGV) will return 60 per cent of the money to the artists and retain 40 per cent for operating expenses.

The volunteer auctioneers are a big part of the show. Don Cal on video is even more charming than Ida Clarkson.

Artists who bring forth work have many motives. There is the much-vaulted publicity angle, not to be sneezed at when big audiences look at work that might otherwise have left the studio. And these auctions have turned into the most stimulating group shows in the year’s gallery-going. The way the AGGV does it, it’s less a charity than a forced sale for the artists.

The promoters know there are plenty of willing artists. UVic had given honorary degrees to Bill Reid and Toni Onley, and sure enough those two donated handsome work. The AGGV recently had shows of many of the artists whose work came up for bids. An entirely different subculture considers “Tag’s” homebase and made donations of all sorts (including a vasectomy) for auction. The art dealers too, make sure to keep their “stable” of artists up front and in the public eye.

If you’ve ever had your own work up on the block, then you know the ringing in your ears when your number comes up, the hot flush, and (usually) the numb disappointment of finding that the general public doesn’t think you’re worth what you think you’re worth. What exactly does it mean that Kay Ratcliffe regularly sells her work for $450 in the gallery but it only fetches $350 at the auction? The charity auction crowd has their favourites, regardless of tastes in the big world. At UVic Christine Richards and Ardath Davis were hotly bid for; local loyalties holding them high. Out-of-towners just didn’t have a chance.

...Are auctions a good place to buy art? The artists choose what to send, aware of the publicity but knowing that they won’t likely get a “gallery price”. For the bidder, there’s auction fever to contend with—the hammer is coming down, the auctioneer telling you you’ll hate yourself in the morning if you don’t buy something. And there are some good deals: good work by Siebner, Thorn, Pat Martin Bates for under $350.

There never was a more fickle audience than auction goers. At UVic Millicent Shapiro’s work didn’t reach her minimum and was sent home. But at the AGGV one of hers made $1500, almost twice as much as the next highest in the evening. Many artists seemed to take a perverse pleasure in watching a Toni Only reach only $850, nowhere near his “sticker price”. Down at Pagliacci’s the fans had different favourites. Phyllis Serota, Laird Campbell and David Bruce got solid support. But there’s no logic, when you can buy a Jim Lindsay oil for $50 and Mimi Jones brings in $375 for a watercolour.

What can we make of all this? Charity auctions moved 400 works of art this fall, more than the annual turnover of any single gallery in town. It’s bound to have some effect on the profile of art sales in this city. Will the public be educated or satiated? Why do living artists sell at charity auctions when their contemporary works just die at the regular “fine art” auctions? Perhaps artists will always be seen as the simple solution for fund-raisers; perhaps auctions are the necessary alternative to unenterprising commercial galleries. These events do indicate, though, that there are lots of people who don’t mind buying art, if they can convince themselves it’s “for a good cause”.

MONDAY MAGAZINE—NOV. 5-11, 1982
BARRY TILL, curator of Asian Art at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, has brought a lot of expertise to his position. Now he's bringing every major historical Chinese painting in Canada to the gallery. The exhibition, entitled, Major Chinese Paintings in Canadian Collections, (Dec. 9-Feb. 13) will be a unique experience, "as good as anything in North America", says Till. "As far as quality, 30 of them are first class, can't be beaten."

In this exhibit the oldest paintings ever exhibited in Canada will be shown for the first time. "One is from 669 A.D., one from 670, and one from 828 A.D. They are being lent to us by Mr. Arthur Menzies, former Canadian Ambassador to China," says Till. The paintings came from Dun huang Buddhist grottoes. The grottoes date from the Fourth Century A.D. There are approximately 500 of them left today, and inside they're all painted. In the 11th Century, one of the caves was filled with paintings and walled up by the monks, who feared an invasion. This cave was lost until the early 20th Century when Sir Aurel Stein was able to buy from it about 6,000 paintings for $40. He hauled them off to the British Museum. Another 6,000 went to the Musée Guimet in Paris, and a missionary named James Menzies also purchased a few of them. His son, the ambassador, has agreed to loan those to this exhibition.

Almost all the good Chinese paintings in Canada were once part of the collection of R.W. Finlayson. Barry Till explained, "Mr. Finlayson was always a resident of Toronto. I don't think he ever went to China. But what he did was fantastic. He went around the world and purchased Chinese paintings from the best sources—Spinks and Sons, Blueets, Sotheby's, and well-known collectors. He had the advisors and he didn't make any mistakes. If it wasn't for him it would be literally a desert for Chinese paintings in Canada."

In the late 1960s, the Finlaysons gave 15 or 16 Chinese paintings to Canada's National Gallery. And to Victoria they gave one very important Chinese item. Victoria has also been chosen as a repository for their Japanese paintings. There are about 25 here already, and Finlayson's widow continues to make generous donations. No one can argue when Barry Till says "we do have the best Japanese collection in Canada. And we're getting better all the time."

But the subject of this show is Chinese paintings. I asked Till if authentic old Chinese paintings ever get out of China today. "Not now. They did in the old days—a lot of them used to belong to the Imperial Family. When the Dynasty was overthrown they had no income and ended up selling some of the national treasures. "America is known for having a huge number of specialists in painting. The Europeans tend to specialize in Chinese ceramics. In fact, the Americans are, in my opinion, the most knowledgeable scholars of Chinese paintings in the world. There are a few good people in China but the field has been taken over by Westerners."

What does he mean by an "authentic" painting? "One that is almost without doubt by a certain artist. Chinese paintings were produced en masse. People always copied the masters. Of a particular painter, if there are 500 paintings, probably only 10 or 15 would be real. To buy an authentic painting now would cost at least $30,000. And only the very best scholars can tell which ones are authentic." The experts have been polled, and Till is confident that in this show 75 per cent are without doubt authentic.

How about one's chances of buying an authentic Chinese painting cheaply? "There's no hope," he says. Arthur Menzies, former Canadian ambassador to China, spoke at the gallery on Buddhist paintings in China on December 2nd. Later, at the university, Richard Barnhart of Princeton will be giving three lectures. And Michael Knight of the Seattle Art Museum is expected as well. There will be a lot of scholars coming to town to see this, the best Chinese painting show Canada has ever seen. Don't miss it.

As a counterpoint to the venerable paintings at Victoria's Art Gallery, go to the Stephen Lowe Gallery, 637 Humboldt St. at the Empress Hotel (384-3917) before the end of January and see the paintings of Stephen Lowe.

Lowe died in 1975 at the age of 37. To some Victorians he remains a legend, almost a saint. His is not the esoteric art of the ancient masters but the popular, decorative and colourful birds and flowers of the modern Lingham School of southern China. On display are about 50 of his original paintings, from the family's own as well as private collections. It's not a sale but it is a chance to see paintings with a breadth and vivacity which has never been equalled in Victoria.

The pottery is still best

WAYNE NGAN
Whales Gallery, 1007 Fort Street, 365-5525 until January 14

What is Wayne Ngan doing at Whales Gallery? From his home on Hornby Island, Ngan has achieved a reputation in Canada and much further afield as a potter of exceptional ability. And for years now he has been saying that he is going to give it up and paint. This exhibition is Victoria's first chance to see his paintings.

The walls are hung with medium-sized acrylic paintings on canvas. In the foyer adjacent are a number of brush-drawn ink paintings, mostly of birds. Also included in the show is a selection of his pots and plates.

The acrylics are abstracts, harmonies of colour and shape built up in a constructivist mode. They are reminiscent of Kandinsky, and to a lesser degree Miro. They are intelligent, well-made, and yet already dated. Ngan graduated from the Vancouver School of Art in 1963 and his style seems to have been formed then and there. The shapes and colours with which he constructs his balanced tableaux are handled with aplomb, but these paintings already seem passé.

Why would anyone buy a painting when they could get a pot, crafted by this sublime and shining intelligence, at one-tenth the price? Perhaps Ngan switched to painting to cash in on the high prices painters ask. In that case he shouldn't show pots and paintings together. The pots are more sensual, more famous, more functional and considerably cheaper. And the pots are selling very well, the paintings hardly at all.

The ink drawings were a surprise, and show Ngan has a certain facility with the brush. This is especially evident in the broadly-brushed abstract works reminiscent of his ceramic decor. But the bird paintings were too timid to pass muster. He has neither the patient hand of Stephen Lowe nor the cultivated simplicity of Stephen Sham.

Wayne Ngan is the best potter in Canada. Judging by his activity in Victoria this winter he hasn't really stopped making ceramics. As a painter in acrylics he is competent but not very thrilling. His bird paintings are weak, though he has the potential to create vivacious and powerful abstractions with ink and brush. But why? Of course, the artist will do whatever he chooses. But it's obvious what he does best. Ngan is a potter.

IT'S OUR INFORMATION
Sid Tafler's column ("Some Sticky Questions" Public Eye, Monday, Dec. 3-9) was very disturbing. Although Mr. Tafler focused on the difficulties that journalists are encountering in ferreting information out of the ministry of finance, the problem of secrecy is much more endemic in the provincial government. Although a freedom of information law has been discussed on and off for several years in British Columbia, it appears to be a very low priority with this government.

The notion of such a law is hardly a radical one. New Brunswick has an excellent statute and three or four other provinces also have laws or are actively contemplating them at this time. The federal Access to Information Act was passed in July and will be proclaimed as law sometime in the new year.

As taxpayers, we pay for the information which government officials are apparently hiding from Mr. Tafler and others. A freedom of information law has had a great impact in other governments by changing the attitude of public servants. It also makes the rules of the game more certain for all concerned.

A freedom of information law is long overdue in British Columbia. I hope that Mr. Tafler's column stirs others inside and outside government to get on with this vital reform.

REMEMBERED ART
Thank you for two fine articles on art by Robert Amos (Seven Days, Monday, Dec. 3-9)

Though Max Maynard was a dear friend, I fear he was not appreciated as much as he should be for his art. Bob seems to have the knack of telling of Max's artistic life with eloquence and dignity—two things which characterized Max, the man, the writer and the artist. I hope we'll have follow-up reporting on his upcoming retrospective at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria in May, 1983.

The other article, "The New Art Craze" was timely, too. Like many artists who contributed to these auctions, I was not disappointed in the low sales figures. My work went where it was loved and appreciated which is, I believe, why so many artists contribute their works for these art auctions.

I'd like to hear other opinions on this!

FORGOTTEN ART
Whatever has happened to your coverage of the local art scene? While your correspondent Robert Amos is philosophizing about wildlife auctions and Don Cal's charm, there are a lot of excellent exhibitions in Victoria which he chooses to ignore. For instance:

- The current Siebner exhibition at the Backroom Gallery. This gallery, recently reopened after the last owner's financial failure, not only needs your support—it deserves it.
- The Oak Bay Art Show. Held early in November, this was one of the finest group exhibitions I've seen in many years. Twenty-five high quality local artists like Bill Murray, Eliza Hawkins, Joan McGregor, Della Paranich, Rosemary James. I also saw Robert Amos there, not exhibiting but gathering material for his column—or so I thought. Alas, the write-up never materialized.
- An unassuming, but nevertheless good quality group showing of works by McGregor, Cheshire, Ashton, and Young, during November at the U-Frame-It Gallery on Douglas St. was apparently not worthy of Amos' notice.

Victoria's artists need Monday. If Amos can't do the job then get someone who can—please.

Jack Riley

Ed note: For every art show covered in Monday, there are 20 that are not. The same applies—in varying proportions—to touring musical shows, profiles of artists, actors, authors and craftsmen, films and books. Robert Amos submits, often without pay, about three times as much as we print.

CREEPING NEGATIVITY
We Canadians are a strange bunch. Everyone has poked a finger in the air at our Prime Minister, including your cartoonist (Bierman's Gallery, Monday, Nov. 12-18). A cartoonist has to make a living and most of the time he will draw what we want to see.
Computer graphics’ greatest hits

What’s capable of 79,000 colours, should become the North American standard for video graphics display, and was developed in Canada? It’s called Telidon and Victoria’s Glenn Howarth is without question the foremost artist working the medium.

H.G. Brown, Canada’s Department of Communications, developed Telidon, a videotext protocol which can present words and pictures in a language written for Telidon terminals. Dave Godfrey, head of Victoria’s computer-assisted learning company, Softwords, was at work in the information revolution. He needed a talented “chef” to cook up some delicious menus and that’s where painter Glenn Howarth came in.

In Howarth’s opinion, the designs used by B.C. Tel’s Telidon (on display at the Victoria Public Library) are quite unimaginative. This medium has not been considered an art form, and “technology doesn’t guarantee access to the human imagination,” as he puts it. A good writer, and visually literate, one of Howarth’s first tasks was to script and design Telidon display monographs explaining National Research Council projects in a format he calls “Disneyland-colour and high-school clear”.

Two years of work led him to a proposal to participate in the prestigious Sao Paulo Biennale, an international art show in Brazil. He intended to install Telidon in operation, stripped of its chassis and exposed in a plexiglass case—“raw technology”, he calls it. The images would be a veritable “greatest hits” of Canadian computer graphics. And furthermore, they would be displayed next to the relatively crude French Antiope “alphamosaic” system. As both were aimed at capturing a ripe Brazilian market, the chance for Canadian promotion looked great.

The Canada council recommended the proposal to the Department of External Affairs, who promised to pay most of the costs. They in turn asked the Department of Communications to assist, but perhaps that group couldn’t see the art show as more than a trade fair. Rumours flew, and time passed. “Nobody decided against the project,” Howarth explained. “It just died.” Canada will not be represented at this year’s Sao Paulo Biennale.

When will the next chance come? Until it does, “paperless publisher” Dave Godfrey and Glenn Howarth, the best designer in business, will continue punching in pictures in the small office upstairs at Market Square.

Comic kamikaze
SHEILA GOSTICK
X-Changes Gallery, 891 North Park, Feb. 25
New Eats Social Club, 501's Pigeon St., Feb. 26

Gawky and mocking, Sheila Gostick lurched into view with her feet screwed on sideways and took the audience with her right from the start. A good crowd of "young people with the standard daring haircut" chuckled and snorted their way through the next hour and 40 minutes. The Smart Person's Comedienne had arrived in Victoria. "I come here going 'yeah, yeah, yeah'. They go 'no, no, no... well maybe'". Gostick came from Toronto and this is her first tour out west. Her perceptions of us are novel. "Everybody here is just a little bit moody," she surmised. An unabashed easterner, she made Salmon Arm sound like a disease.

Though billed as "punk — gunky — punk," she's more like Carol Burnett for people who gave up on TV. This is recognizable stand-up comedy stylings aimed at new targets. "I feel so bad when I see kids with blue hair. They want something to fight but their lives are just too nice. They've got gold ten-speed bicycles... let's ship them to England. They can rebel against mushy peas and no central heating."

There's nothing that Canadians like better than jokes about Canada. She brought us a bit of Vancouver, the home of laid-back violence — "maybe tomorrow I think I might torch something... I kinda feel it comin' on." Calgary, "where the buildings still have their wrappers on." Toronto, "the city of the future — and always will be."

Perhaps the most interesting feature of this comic kamikaze is her truly Canajun elocution. She can wring endless changes on "ok-uh-no-really-ok-uh-no-I mean-really-ok-no-ok?" and her impersonation of the jerk in the van — "hey baby, hey babe, hey baby, hey baby" is spot on. She identifies the politician's lust (or Old World culture: "It's gonna be really Yurupoon — like he knows, he's been

Admiring the past

VICTORIA SYMPHONY, Sidney Harth, guest cond., Mozart, Bach, Haydn, Royal Theatre, Feb. 27.

P art of the Victoria Symphony's success story this year, or program of fiscal restraint, has been the substitution of local or national soloists for very expensive "stars". In the case of conductor/violinist Sidney Harth, the guest last weekend, the gain and saving are ours, as here is a musician of outstanding merit who can convince the orchestra to play with precision and beauty.

Physically, Harth belies his musical elegance, as a conductor beating time with a bow, the violin grasped under an arm, is at an automatic balletic disadvantage. Yet, in Mozart's Violin Concerto # 5 (A Major), he showed that most of his work must be

The Federation of Canadian Artists was founded in 1941 in Kingston, Ontario, but continues to exist only in British Columbia. Here, it is a non-profit, self-supporting art society with over 1,000 members. Among its members are the big names on the right wing of our provincial art scene. A host of supporting members, active members, associates and senior FCA artists encourage and promote one another at workshops, exhibitions and the prestigious Travelling Show, recently seen in Victoria at the Leafhill Gallery.

The FCA Trave FCA Travelling Show is a goal to aim at for those thousand artists and their admirers. It represents the aesthetic aspirations of a large segment of our society. The FCA is the General Motors of art in B.C.—safe, sane, dependable. The chosen artists can be depended on for satisfactory technique and middle-of-the-road subject matter. Words like “nice” and “lovely” spring unbidden to the lips in the presence of good representative work by these local uinomaries and provincial art stars.

Brian Travers-Smith heads the list. In his painting, perfectly controlled washes and felicous colours surround quaint fishboats rolling at anchor. Robert Genere's updated Group of Seven technique—the blocky brush stroke and stylized trees—are there, too. Dorothy Oxborough displays a portrait of a glummed Indian chief, bathed in the reflected golden light of the old west. Into this august company of artist Randy McBeth. He's young, local and very talented. His photographic Baskets in Snow is gently and beautifully painted. And he has yet to drop into any well-worn groove of subject matter. These are among the stylist professionals who can be depended upon.

It's hard to be as generous with the works of some locals chosen for this show. Kay Kitchell's Moths of Morning is not one of her best. It is a very wet watercolour of a bland vagueness not at all relieved by a liberal addition of salt crystal traces. Her lush florals recently seen at Victoria's city hall show her skills to better advantage. And Carl Coger's pastel, Southwest Alberta, seems a flippant choice for this show, considering what this superb portraitist is capable of. It depicts a railroad bridge in front of the Rockies. The bridge bears the gnarfied "rock lives!" evidence of a humour in Coger's work not apparent in that of his colleagues. Consider Glen Hawkins' Portrait of a Turkey—had there been any humour evident, with such a title we would not have expected this still close-up of a bird's head. Ardith Davis is represented by a wet-on-wet watercolour of a country lane which exhibits all the mannered imprecision so beloved of amateurs and none of the probing depth evident in more serious work.

The paintings are representational in every case. Subject matter touches the sentimental working man (old truck, the cowboys' branding fire, fishboats) or nature worship (arbutus trees, wood ducks, roadside flowers), and avoids psychology or contemporary themes. It's like staying at the Holiday Inn—no surprises.

Regardless of the criticism of individual work, the FCA is a model organization. Government at any level has long since atrophied in its support of visual art. And the more challenging and imaginative artists seem incapable of concerted professional effort. However, the FCA is a success.

The FCA is self-supporting. It brings art to its audience and audiences to its art. It sets standards in an age when standards are hard to come by. The FCA is alive and well and an important force of art in B.C.—

Vis a Vis Scotland's Dilemma:

Since killer whales have been found not to be killers after all, and since they are so well-studied as to be no longer a mystery...

the obvious solution to Scotland's dilemma is to fill their pool with a truly dangerous marine specimen - a US Navy Hunter-Killer Submarine!

They're hard to catch and can be taught loads of tricks. We're always hearing about them but not many people have seen one. They don't die in captivity and they're native to our waters. How about it?

Yours sincerely,

Robert Amos.
Naked politics

WHEN NAKED CITY, the display of nudes, went up on the walls of city hall (until Feb. 1), 20 city employees signed a letter to the mayor; paintings were taken down in disgust, and Lance Olsen’s Pimp made the front page of the Times-Colonist. The paintings, by a dozen local artists, aren’t so shocking—they’ve been seen before in galleries here—but the reaction is new. Curator Luis (Liberals Awake!) Ituarte couldn’t be happier: “I’m delighted with the controversy.”

For three years, the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria has used these city hall shows to make its presence felt to a municipal government whose support for the visual arts was recently described by George Kidd, the gallery board chairman, as “about the lowest in Canada.” The art is marshalled and hung by the gallery, but citizen and artist Luis Ituarte makes the selection. He, in turn, has his own political agenda. He sees the shows as “a beautiful way of criticizing the art gallery,” in particular its cool and condescending attitude to most Victoria artists. None of the pieces shown in Naked City is ever likely to be shown in the gallery proper.

Ituarte has been volunteer curator of the project for over two years. He shows professionals, like Carl Coger, as well as those who haven’t yet the confidence to show in galleries. “The national disease for the artist is insecurity,” he explains, and this is his way of doing something about it.

THE WOODWORKERS ARE WAITING

VICTORIA is blessed with many things that attract furniture makers—a tradition of wooden houses, a reverence for handbuilt quality and a lifestyle that values the creative individual.

In these days of malls and mail order, some people have forgotten that they can have things made by hand, made to order and made to last. Woodworking factories and builders in Victoria are just waiting for orders.

“We’ve got to get people thinking that they can purchase good furniture made locally,” says Jim Mendzla of J & L Design (544 Hillside Ave. (383-2533)), a good model for what local industry can do. They got their big start manufacturing a line of oak furniture which was sold through Easton’s and all over Western Canada. With the crash of the retail market in 1982 they switched to custom work and now they make hotel suites, computer tables and domestic items as fast as they can. “Business is absolutely booming”, Mendzla reports.

Oak kitchen cabinets provide half of their business, though cedar is becoming popular. The four employees have proved that custom items can beat the prices in retail stores.

Lifestyle Monastery Furniture, 942 Fort St. (383-2433), combines custom woodworking and a retail shop. Their factory on Lampoon Road employs seven full-time woodworkers and keeps their intriguing store on Fort Street well supplied with hutches, buffets and tables in oak, alder and pine. In addition they carry “knock-down” imported furniture from elsewhere, and a host of specially consigned items, from gun cabinets to platform rockers for kids. And what you don’t see, they will happily make for you.

Wenge wood chair by Mark Wallace

Millwork shops can do just about anything with wood, though mainly they make architectural items—windows and doors, for example—rather than free-standing furniture. Stuart and Brown Joinery, 526 Discovery St. (382-3011), is the biggest, but smaller shops can offer special services. At Heartwood Joinery, 3318 Vianca (383-7212), store interiors are the specialty. Examples include the new B.I. Sports Shop and Roots Store on Broad Street. Owners Stephen Pierrot and David Holland are certified journeymen joiners, and believe you “are not only a carpenter”.

They also repair old wooden window frames without removing the window from the wall.

Percy Erglis is the man in charge of Clearwater Wood Industries, 874 Devonshire (385-7137). As with many woodworkers, Clearwater depends on kitchen cabinets. This shop makes a specialty of veneer and applying it to domestic furniture. Erglis says they get most of their jobs by referral. Word must be getting around—they’ve been in business for 12 years.

In 1982 the Malwood Museum (part of the University of Victoria) displayed work of The Designers/Cabinetmaker. This was a seminal event for local woodworkers, giving birth to the Victoria Woodworkers Guild (595-2763). It has attracted a large membership who are responsible for much of the best custom furniture in Victoria. Chairs of drawers by president Ken Guenther, 2549 Forbes (595-2763) are a case in point. Using old joinery techniques Guenther creates one-of-a-kind items out of hardwoods like Honduran mahogany, birch and maple. Dressers, chests of drawers and trestle tables are his most popular designs. Guenther’s work got a lot of attention at his recent one-man show at Bente Rehm’s Craft Gallery, but admits it’s very difficult to make a living as a custom furniture maker.

Cameron Russell, 1175 Chapman (385-6454), is in the guild’s current show at the McPherson Theatre Mezzanine Gallery (until April 29, 586-6121). Russell is very good at desk-building and recently has applied his skills to the dashboard of a Lotus sports car and a box for sheep tattooing equipment. He has shown at craft fairs, as has Guenther, but feels the competition with potters, while friendly, is just too stiff. “Montrose and Victoria don’t show on the surface, so it’s hard to make people understand why our work costs so much,” he says.

The frustration that woodworkers feel is even more distressing to the designer-builders. Mark Wallace of Design Alternatives graduated with high marks from Ontario’s Sheridan College. In his handsome showroom in the Stores Building, 259 Esquimalt Road (383-8911), the influence of William Morris, Charles Rennie Macintosh, the Bauhaus and Shaker furniture of America are evident. A superb glass-fronted cabinet, eight feet tall in maple, blends modern and ancient Egyptian lines. Wallace has dreams of a shop where people go when they need a cupboard or a cabinet.

Frustrated or not, the designer-builders are around. Stephen Berry, 1127 Reynolds Road (479-3360), after years of teaching and travelling, now works with wood full time. His special item is the “back chair”, a bent wood design for correct posture which sells for under $200. Another specialist, Dean Farley, 259 Esquimalt (384-3219), designs and builds furniture for pre-schoolers.

Allan Collier, 14 Fan Tan Alley (383-2112), designs furniture which owes something to contemporary Italian modes, using coloured lacquers and high tech to achieve high quality. While many people believe “they don’t make ‘em like they used to”, Collier believes he can make “em even better with new wood materials, new adhesives and new finishes. Collier’s co-worker Daryl Richardson is the most progressive furniture designer in Victoria. A disillusioned former architecture student, Richardson now designs items to suit many functions. Just a few pieces of his affordable modular geometric shapes, covered with coloured abalone, can make a sterile apartment into a flexible home base.

Also in the Chinatown area David Pottier, 12 Fan Tan Alley (384-3234) makes hammer dulcimers; Jim Silven, 507 Pigott St. (386-5354), recreates heritage home detail and David Peacock, 522 Discovery (384-3332), will design and build a billiard table in art deco or any other style.

There are old school professionals to turn to as well. Elmar Morgenard, 18 Fan Tan Alley (388-5536), trained in Denmark and came to Victoria in the 1950s. Since then he’s found plenty of work repairing choice old items and executing special projects. Gregory Brown, 10763 Macdonald Pk. Rd. (656-6990), the hit of the 1982 Malwood Museum Show, is a wizard with veneer and delicate antique reproductions, is always months behind his orders.

Maurice Foundler works out of Tools ‘N’ Space, 338 Catherine St. (383-9600) and does custom orders. Teaching there are Tom Stetche, furniture maker Michael Utholf, and Matthew Ashken, a specialist at wood turning. Tools ‘N’ Space, now in its seventh year, began as a do-it-yourself shop, but its emphasis is shifting from classes to custom work to selling materials and tools for furniture makers.

Given this talent, the satisfaction of custom ordering, and the claim from most woodworkers that their prices are competitive, all that is lacking is a bit of imagination from the buyers.
In and out of bounds

THE RAPE OF EROS. Open Space. 510 Fort Street. 363-6833. until March 9

OUT OF BOUNDS. North Park Studio. 1619 Store Street. 381-3422. until Feb. 28

THE RAPE of Eros is determined to educate us with a presentation of a dozen nudes by Joe Average and a sustained series of images from Toronto's Andy Fabo. The Average drawings are below average— in fact he's better represented in the North Park Show Out of Bounds. But Fabo's tarpaulins, sketches and paintings-on-the-wall demand our attention.

Contemporary painting is supposed to break barriers and incite a response. Fabo has painted scenes of phallic plunder at top speed, on whatever comes to hand. A 12-foot high orgy of anal penetration is dashed off directly on the wall of the gallery; angry drawings on old pages of the New York Times show men with ballistic penises and volcanic heads: on large tarpaulins snakes, nails and rape are painted in garish colours. Standards of morality, politics and aesthetics are wilfully flouted here.

The thesis, dictated by Open Space curator Michael Harding, seems to be that the power of erotic love has been subverted and directed to other ends—war, aggression, humiliating sex. Fabo works hard to express this hateful vision, letting all the demons out of his personal Pandora's box, and he succeeds in creating a powerful negative atmosphere. In one final painting he attempts to balance all the negative aspects with an evocation of love, but the balance is not achieved.

This tirade of an art show is so entirely out of bounds that Fabo has alienated his audience. He's just too far out.

NORTH PARK is struggling to create a curatorial identity and Out of Bounds is an attempt to kick out the jams a bit. While not entirely successful, this miscellany does present some adventurous art.

The hit of the show is Clint Atkinson's huge charcoal drawing For the Molson Corporation. Atkinson, formerly a student of Glenn Howarth at UVic, has built up a dense dark mesh of scribble from which he has erased the highlights of an image. Invisible at close range, from ten feet back it shows up as a carload of beer drinkers.

Michael Lewis' paintings weld the jagged flash of comic books and the angularity of German expressionism a la George Grosz into depictions of the seamy side of Victoria. Lewis, a self-taught artist, is at once naive and historically aware.

North Park is the most progressive commercial gallery in town and one might have expected the cutting edge of Lance Olsen, David Toresdahl or Will Julsing, tough and challenging artists whose work North Park has hung before. Instead, this show is diluted with the gentle pop of Chris Doman's cartoons on glass—mildly novel but hardly "out of bounds." The same can be said of Patrick Amiot's baked sculptures. Amiot's cute scene of four men pushing a car in the snow, made of painted clay, gets a lot of attention but it does not belong in this show.

Kelly Irving produced a contentious installation piece from his Department of Cow Public Works especially for the exhibition but it was vetoed by the staff. "Out of Bounds" indeed. An excellent chance to educate the public taste has been missed.

Into the streets: Some people think art doesn’t belong in the ivory tower. Among them are the organizers of a gallery called Ideas: Sacred and Profane. Government St., open Thurs.-Sun., 12-5 pm. They base each show on an issue (rape, torture, animal experiments) and invite artists of conscience to display. On principle they are not government funded and if you look at the current offering, The B.C. Spirit (until Nov. 30), you’ll know why.

Never have so many creative people displayed such solidarity of disdain as they do about Bill Bennett and his regime of restraint. Michael Nahser’s Sewer Natural B.C., Betty Warnock’s logged-out Waterland’s Dream and Robin Campbell’s planed-over and dismembered Meares Island set the tone—beyond opposition to disgust. Jeannie Kamin’s painting of an orgiastic pig-out of cabinet ministers is entitled Thank God they don’t have the bomb. In another work, Grace McCarthy is depicted handing out cake to the downtrodden. Robin Lambert identifies a new fascism in which the dollar-sign replaces the swastika. Eventually satire and disgust give way to a chilling vision of evil—Lance Olsen’s Gweed Geeks.

This is art with relevance and commitment. It’s not a beautiful show, but it’s a good one. The gallery is to be encouraged. (R.A.)
Service with a smile

WAITRESSES: Photographs by Tandra Moreland at Southside Cafe, 1215 Broad St. (381-6644) until Jan. 31

T Andrea Moreland isn’t a waitress — she’s a photographer. But she has worked as a waitress. “It’s something almost all women have done. It’s nurturing,” she says. “Yet many women who work at it are just filling in, carrying on, waiting until they become concert pianists, or dancers.” Or professional photographers.

Moreland graduated from Fine Arts at the University of Victoria where teacher Fred Douglas was a big influence. Though she has painted and potted and worked in a pet shop, her photographic explorations have taken precedence. Documentary portraits in black and white are the form she has chosen, in the tradition of Nina Raginsky or Diane Arbus. Morehead presents her pictures as large murals, five by three feet in size.

From her Denman Island home she first produced a series called Women of Vancouver Island, presented in January 1984 at the Courtenay Arts Alliance. In the process, she photographed dozens of men and women but found “the women appear stronger than the men. The back-to-the-land movement is essentially a matriarchal society. The men were excited by leaving the nine-to-five te- dium of their lives but it was all too often the women who had to deal with much of the drudgery, as well as bear the children and attempt to raise them — without indoor plumbing.”

The current show depicts waitresses. Though Moreland has photographed hundreds of them, both old and young, not everyone was willing to participate. “Older women kept trying to talk me into taking pictures of the younger, prettier ones,” she remembers. They are not at all candid snapshots: Moreland has her subjects face front, standing in their workplace. Whether from fear of the camera, or their employers, or the timidity which comes from a subservient role, some waitresses refused to be photographed.

Those who consented give us a glimpse of the common world in a formal setting. Two types emerge. There are the young ones, confident and forthright who can rise above the stereotype. And there are older women, standing patiently in sensible shoes. These latter seem to have accepted their position, smiling quietly, expecting nothing.

Moreland’s photographs are direct, without gimmicks, almost artless. They make up one of the most appropriate shows yet seen in the increasingly popular realm of art in the restaurants.

Not to be missed: Brian S. McElney’s $2.6 million collection of Chinese ceramics tops a new slate of shows at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria (1040 Moss St., 384-4101). This collection, on loan from Hong Kong, comes from one of the greatest private collections in the world and contains superb examples of the great moments of Chinese pottery. Here until March 27, it will go on to the Vancouver Art Gallery.

Curator Greg Bellerby has also brought in two rooms full of eloquent, engaging and beautiful paintings by Vancouver’s Gathie Falk (until March 31); subjects as ordinary as the autumn leaves on her sidewalk and as mysterious as the night sky, creating the best show of contemporary painting we have seen here in years. Eighty of the finest Northwest Native Prints (until March 10) are included with the $2 admission charge.— R.A.

Fire sale afterthoughts: Bidders at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria’s fourth annual art auction March 25th avoided a “slow-dancing” demonstration on the front steps by art activist Luis Ituarte. In a painted jumpsuit, he demanded the resignation of gallery director Patricia Bovey “for the sake of West Coast Culture”. In his text Ituarte claimed that the art gallery “is a private club for rich ladies, sponsored by the taxpayer.”

While most of the gallery’s money does come from the taxpayer, the gallery auction is an important fund-raiser. In this year’s version artists donated 108 paintings and sculptures, which in the main sold for about 50 per cent of the prices being asked at the city’s struggling commercial galleries. The exception was a small drawing by the late Richard Cicciormarra of Victoria (donated by one of his wives) which sold for $1,150, far and away the best price obtained. (Cicciormarra’s profile is starting to rise; one reason: Monday contributor Frank Nowosad is writing a biography of him.)

The art gallery should be asking serious questions about this event. The artists submit mediocre work, and art buyers come away with bargains instead of beauty. The gallery, which takes from 40-100 per cent of the proceeds, feels it has contributed to the recognition of local talent, but by raising funds through an ill-chosen, poorly hung “fire sale”, it undercuts the real value of visual arts in Victoria. Shore leave in Old Town Victoria

When gold was discovered on the Fraser River in 1858 the Port of Victoria took off with a boom. Everyone coming into the province had to come through Victoria. The Canadian Pacific Railway was completed in 1884 and soon the town was inundated with 17,000 Chinese laborers trying to get home. Again, in 1896-7, gold seekers bound for the Klondike outfitted themselves on Johnson Street with sleds and snowshoes. Rum-running during the prohibition era in the U.S.A. also kept pockets well-filled in the “Old Town” of Victoria. What was it like for a sailor on shore leave, or for a gold seeker, arriving in Victoria in the 1890’s?

The spanking breeze of a sunny afternoon sent many a brig sailing into the harbour but, after months at sea hunting the whale, the sea-otter or the seal, the crew were eager to trade the fresh westerlies for the dust of a city street. No sooner was the ship made fast at Turner, Beeton and Company’s wharf at the foot of Johnson Street than rolled up beds went flying over the rail; lashed chests went sliding down the gangway and the sailors left their ship to the stevedores.

The City of Victoria beckoned. Seamen left behind the jumble of masts and funnels, heading up towards the chimney pots, flag poles and firetowers they’d seen from afar, towards the beacon atop the Oriental Hotel.

In the old days, the area between Wharf and Store Streets, now a thoroughfare at the east end of the Johnson Street Bridge, was heavily built up. There, behind the pallsides of the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Station, a huffing locomotive waited to pull the train over the bridge and up the island. On Store Street, horse drawn traffic and men in black hats bustled along the dusty road, carrying on the trade which made Victoria the “San Francisco of the North”.

Idlers on the verandah of the Occidental Hotel overlooked the scene at Johnson and Store Streets, while on the plank sidewalk beneath there was a terrific coming and going in the shops. Gino Bossi, the proprietor of the Grand Pacific Saloon across the street, stood in his apron at the swinging doors, welcoming the public into the bar, a world of piano tunes, potted palms and pints of dark ale.

What had been shacks and tents a few years before now took on a look of permanence, with architecture in brick and stone designed by the talented Thomas Hooper. Next to the Grand Pacific Hotel (later known as the infamous Drake Hotel) stood the Senator Hotel, and then the Empire Hotel, and just beyond the Pantages Theatre was the Railroad Hotel. Their handsome facades still stand beside the Johnson Street en-
A man just in from the sea has no need of a bed. Ignoring the hotels, our sailor made his first stop at the barber, then on to the clothes' to spend his bankroll on the latest fashions. Soon he was outfitted in a smart jacket, glossy trousers that seemed to be made of sheet iron, a collarless flannel shirt and a shiny new pair of boots. Sea togs were dropped off at the Chinese laundry, and would soon be flapping in the breeze behind the Johnson Street facade. A cigar rolled up on one of the two local factories completed his city attire.

Johnson Street held innumerable attractions for the windowshopper even in those days. Hart's Indian Bazaar proffered native goods from the longhouse and both Pardoe's Gunsmiths and Pichon and Lenfesty Gunsmiths could be irresistible to the right sort of man. Yet if a sailor was going to afford one of those lovely rifles, he'd have to save money on his lodgings. In behind the fancy Colonial Hotel (later the Colonial Metropole) were tiny brick "cabins" where a fellow could shack up, and around the block on Cormorant Street (which we call Pandora) rough plank huts, tenements and tents were available.

Over on Cormorant Street, the Chinatown side of Market Square, the boardwalks and balconies along the three-storey brick buildings were the same, but fruit and vegetables, chickens and crabs and huge trays of fresh fish almost crowded one off the sidewalk. Natives paddled over or walked across the railway bridge from the Songhees Reserve on the other side of the harbor to squat in doorways with baskets of potatoes and clams. In tiny storefronts, oriental tailors and shoemakers plied their needles oblivious to the hurly-burly of pigtailed Chinese toting heavy baskets on long springy carrying sticks.

In the floors above the shops on Cormorant Street, dozens of tiny cubicles were filled with tiers of bunkbeds, and "cheater floors" were built like galleries where ceilings were high enough to permit this. The darkness and lack of fresh air within was compounded by the aromas of incense and barbeques; while the smell of opium being processed, a smell like boiling potatoes, often pervaded the old town. Opium was heavily taxed in the U.S.A. but was quite legal in Canada, selling for about one dollar an ounce. The opium factories in Market Square had shop windows on Cormorant Street and forty to fifty per cent of the Chinese laborers were addicted.

The most direct route from Cormorant to Johnson Street was through the courtyard which was to become the centre of Market Square. At the time it was a jumble of lean-tos, alive with the sounds of cockerels and dice. When a sailor new in town stepped gingerly to keep his boots clean, derisive giggles drifted down from the girls idling at tiny windows high above. Their alluring laughter was often drowned out by the music of the honky-tonk piano and the footfall of dancers which rang through the back walls of the Pantages Theatre (now the Jeune Brothers shop at 548 Johnston).

Later in the evening all this area took on a new life. Under clusters of electric lights, some of the first in Canada, the commerce of the day was forgotten and revelry took over. The girls were no longer idle, either plying their trade in the parlors of lighted brothels or meeting customers in some of the fifteen hotels which lined Johnson between Wharf and Government Streets. Many more women of the night worked unseen, consigned to the "cribs" in the darker reaches of the neighborhood.

Just as this was the centre of warehousing and wholesaling by day, by night "demon drink" held sway. Drinks were two for twenty-five cents and it was said that on lower Johnson Street if you rolled out of one bar drunk, you'd just roll into another.

Across Cormorant Street in Fan Tan Alley, men in black pyjamas came and went constantly among the red lanterns of countless restaurants. In this alley alone, twelve gambling houses offered games of chance — mah jongg, fantan, dominoes and the numbers game. Acrobat and singers amused the gamblers between games and somehow even the poorest laborers could afford to play. The Chinese opera was always in session in its theatre on the Buckerfields' lot and a ticket was only five cents.

Cormorant Street, the north side of Market Square, was one of the main streets of Chinatown, and home to many commercial houses which imported food or sold goods wholesale. A number of Victoria's thirty-five Chinese Benevolent Associations set up quarters there, with social rooms, classes in English, tailoring or farming. These societies were also centres for banking and advocacy for at the time, though the Chinese made up half the population of Victoria, they had no rights whatever.

After a night on the town our sailors might ask one another "where did you sleep last night?" with a wink and... demonstrated over on Government Street, or ride on a trolley to Oak Bay. A carriage ride to Bacon Hill was a fine way to spend a day, and the livery stable on Johnson Street was at hand.

For the more serious-minded, the area near Market Square offered a tinsmith, a sailmaker, a fur dealer and a chemist. Toward the end of shore leave many a mariner was obliged to patronize the pawn shops to trade away his new toys for money to pay gambling debts or the hotel bill.

In the end, down the street they'd go, back to the ship and away, leaving with the good feeling that they'd lived life to the full in Victoria.

Over the years the buildings on lower Johnson and Cormorant Streets became Victoria's skidrow and tenderloin. It took considerable imagination for architect Nicholas Bawlf to conceive a project which would result in a complete renewal of this end of town.

In 1974 Fort Victoria Properties purchased nine connected buildings, including three hotels, all of which predate 1900. On the street front the accumulation of signs was removed, the storefronts were stripped to the original, and worn out elements were restored. Grace notes of the past, for example the conical roof atop the Milne Building, were reconstructed and the whole was returned to its former glory of brick and paint.

Inside, Bawlf's design for the courtyard created the most dramatic change. Once the backyard had been filled with sheds, parked cars and trash, but now it features a two-storey balustraded gallery which encircles a landscaped amphitheatre. Around the perimeter sandblasted brick and huge beams provide a tasteful backdrop to the intimate and intriguing windows of over forty specialty shops and restaurants.

Immens trusses of clear, seasoned timber were recovered from the Ogden Point shipyard when it was demolished. They were reerected to form the roof over part of the courtyard, now a focal point for the almost endless panoply of entertainment which unfolds there. The Victoria Symphony, dance groups, jugglers and rock bands have all filled the square with music and people.

Market Square has come back to life, a kind of urban shopping centre for people rather than cars. In 1976 it won a Regional Award of Honor from Heritage Canada for heritage preservation. Once again, both tourists and local folk have taken Market Square to heart.
Borrowed time: "When people found out I had cancer of the liver I could tell they had just one thought—'Oh oh, she's a goner.' People are so uninformed about it. They think that just old people get it and most people die. Well, it's just not so. Lots of people get better and many are finding their lives enriched because of it."

That's artist Liz Scully talking, and her bout with cancer certainly enriched her life. She feels she's living on "gift time" and she's not about to waste a moment.

First she created a series of paintings based on her experiences, and this led to the idea for an animated film. Scully found a great need for information about children and cancer, an age group for which it is the second largest cause of death by disease. With deft artistic skill and a fresh sense of humour, she has been able to present the spectrum of emotions which a life-threatening disease evokes, to emphasize that "cancer is not a guarantee that you die," as she puts it.

Scully's work is a bit reminiscent of cartoonist Lynda Barry—"I've become very interested in the personal in my art," Scully comments. "It's not just me who feels these things—everyone has the same weird thoughts, fears and ecstasies." The story boards on display consider subjects like anger, operations and "being dead," without euphemism. In fact they bounce along with her quirky, positive outlook.

Scully's animated film, though only 10 minutes long, is going to take almost 10,000 drawings. It's going to cost a lot ($13,000), but it will go a long way towards helping children and their families cope with the disease. The National Film Board has kicked in their support, as have musicians and other professionals. The show at North Park Studio (1619 Store St., 381-3422, until May 1) is designed to elicit more backing. Brilliant expressionist paintings regarding the cancer experience and the original story boards will be on display. And on Monday evening, April 22 from 7 pm, Scully will be there for a talk on childhood cancer and a concert by flutist and composer Don Druick. (R.A.)

VICTORIA, B.C.
The railway was completed on November 7, 1885 when the last spike was driven by Donald Smith at Craigellachie, B.C. (He bent the spike on his first swing but succeeded on the second try.) To mark the anniversary, festivities are scheduled in early August in Revelstoke, B.C., 48 kilometres east of Craigellachie. They include a re-enactment of the last spike ceremony by actors in period costume.

Thirty-one snow sheds covering 6-1/2 kilometres of track were built to keep the rail line open in winter, yet even so 200 people died in avalanches in the first 25 years. This prompted the CPR to build the Connaught tunnel under Mt. McDonald. The right of way over the pass was abandoned and is now partly used for hiking trails.

Parks Canada, with help from CP Rail, has built a small museum at the summit of this pass where the rail line's history is told in photos, models and movies.

Kamloops is also doing its part to celebrate the CPR Centennial. From June 7 to July 21 the Kamloops Museum (phone 604-372-9931) will play host to CPR in the Canadian West, an exhibit on loan from Calgary's Glenbow Museum. July 11 is the anniversary of the first train to arrive in Kamloops and in honour of the day the Kamloops Railway Museum Society will officially hand over their extensive collections to the Kamloops Museum.

The British Columbia Provincial Museum in Victoria is presenting a special exhibit celebrating the centennial of the Canadian Pacific Railway. This is particularly fitting for British Columbia because the railway was a major component of that province's terms for joining confederation.

A featured attraction will be British Columbia's oldest steam locomotive, "Emory" or "Old Curly" as it is variously named. Built in 1869 in the U.S.A. it was brought to British Columbia by Andrew Onderdonk, construction contractor for the CPR. The 35-ton saddletank locomotive is on loan from Burnaby Heritage Village.

Inside the museum a charming and surprisingly varied display recreates the sights and sounds of the CPR. Construction surveys and the Chinese contributions are touched on. The steamships which completed the link to the Orient are featured in model, memento and photographs, as are branch lines, interior lakes steamers, and even airlines. Railway and steamship china and furniture, as well as fashions and graphics add a personal touch. Of particular note is a series of paintings by artists sponsored by the CPR in its very early days, depicting the splendour of British Columbia.

Maritime Museum Honours RCN
Vancouver is one of the busiest ports in North America. For 25 years the Maritime Museum has been celebrating the maritime heritage of the Pacific. Surrounded by the sea at Kitsilano Point, the Maritime Museum's exhibits include the 106-year-old sealing schooner Thomas F. Bayard, now under restoration in the "harbour for heritage ships."

This summer the museum is mounting two special exhibits to honour the 75th anniversary of the Royal Canadian Navy. These are titled The Fisherman's Reserve and Armed Yachts. At the site visitors can also tour Parks Canada's St. Roch, the historic Arctic Patrol vessel of the R.C.M.P. which was the first ship to traverse the Northwest Passage.

Of special note is the exhibit of artifacts recently brought to the surface from the U.S. ship, Ericsson. It's being called the find of the century on Canada's west coast. Divers of the Underwater Archaeological Society of British Columbia last February discovered the well-preserved remains of the Ericsson in the shallow waters of Barkley Sound off the west coast of Vancouver Island.

The Ericsson is unique and highly significant in that it was originally equipped with a huge caloric engine which ran on hot air, an invention which its designer, Swedish-American engineer John Ericsson, thought would take over from steam. The 1853 trial voyage in New York Harbour was reported in the press with enthusiasm. But we know now that the ship was slow and the engine so large that there was little room for cargo.

The caloric engine was later replaced with steam. Eventually the steam engine was removed and, rigged as a barque, the Ericsson entered west coast service carrying coal and grain. Bound from San Francisco to Nanaimo in 1892, the ship was blown by a storm into Barkley Sound where it broke up and sank.

For Steam Buffs: B.C. Forest Museum
The B.C. Forest Museum in Duncan, B.C. offers a thrilling glimpse of the era of steam logging in a 100-acre setting of tall trees and woodland tranquility. It has been a popular stopping point beside Somewes Lake, along the Trans-Canada Highway between Victoria and Nanaimo.

The Forest Museum began with the private collection of Gerald Wellburn. Wellburn was a lumberman in the Cowichan valley whose passion for collecting ran from stamps to steam locomotives.

Visitors journey into the past aboard a narrow-gauge steam train. Huge steam-age artifacts are positioned to be seen to the best advantage from the 1.6 km of railway track. As well as turn-of-the-century buildings and logging equipment, the museum features both operational and display steam locomotives including the Number 1 Shay; "Samson," the 1910 Vulcan 18-ton locomotive; and "Susie," the 1900 Vulcan 12-ton. Also on show are steam donkeys and tractors, and logging trucks like the 1918 Maxwell, the 1923 5-ton Republic and the 1920 White. Recent additions include a 30-metre Madill spar, an operational two-man sawmill, and railway equipment from the Yukon and White Pass Railway.

Regina
The Mackenzie Art Gallery of Regina is one of nine Canadian art galleries to exhibit Canada in the Nineteenth Century: The Stitt Collection. This exhibition of early Canadian drawings, paintings and sketches, organized by the Art Gallery of Hamilton and on display at the Mackenzie to July 28, is comprised of 100 of the 300 works of art donated in 1981 to the Art Gallery of Hamilton by Mr. and Mrs. Hubert J. Stitt of Toronto.

The Stitt Collection is a mixture of works of historical significance with key, high calibre items beside the charming primitive work of amateur artists. It is the result of the popular 18th and 19th century practice of recording places, people, events and landscapes by means of drawings and watercolours; a sketchbook, pencil and watercolour box were as commonly found in the traveller's luggage as a camera is today.

Pat Adams: Woven Skies, an exhibition of recent wall pieces by this Saskatoon weaver, will be shown at Regina's Dunlop Gallery, Sherwood Branch, from July 17 to August 21, and at the Dunlop's Glen Elm Branch from August 28 to October 2. Highly regarded for its handsome sturdiness, Adams' work has progressed from the exploration of abstract tonal values to more precise renderings of prairie land and sky.

At the Dunlop Central Library Gallery from June 29 to August 4 is Jeff Funnell: Riel Series. This exhibition of 48 oil pastel drawings by Professor of Fine Art Jeff Funnell of the University of Manitoba was conceived to coincide with the centenary of the Northwest Rebellion and with Riel's death, and is an unusual combination of art, history and education.

Following the Riel Series at the Dunlop Central Gallery, from August 10 to September 15, is Legacy in Ice: The Vaux Family and the Canadian Alps. This exhibition consists of 56 photographs taken in the Canadian Rockies at the turn of the century by members of the Vaux family of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and is the first major study of glaciers in Canada. The Vaux family, though strictly amateurs in the field of photography and science, were nevertheless skilled practitioners in these areas and have made a lasting contribution to the cultural heritage of the Canadian Rockies.

Saskatoon
In Saskatoon at the Mendel Art Gallery to July 21 will be John Sloan, A Printmaker. An accomplished painter, draftsman and printmaker, John Sloan is recognized as one of the most talented and versatile artists of America. From the time he began etching in 1888 at the age of 16, until two years before his death in 1949, Sloan made nearly 400 prints which, today, many consider the most important extant body of graphic art by an American artist.

Two Worlds, an exhibition of contemporary Canadian Indian Art organized by the Mackenzie Art Gallery of Regina, will continue at the Mendel Art Gallery until July 21. Twenty-four works from the important holdings of the Department of Indian and Northern Affairs, Indian Art Section, will provide an overview of the kind and quality of art being produced by Canadians whose Indian heritage informs their work.

Although such notable artists as Norval Morrisseau, Jackson Beardy, Carl Beam and Robert Davidson represent all regions of Canada, the emphasis of Two Worlds will be on such well-known Saskatchewan artists as Allen Sapp, Michael Loucheil, Arthur Shilling and Bob Boyer as well as on such younger artists as Willie Ermine, Sheila Cut-hand and Lorne Finay. Following the showing at the Mendel, Two Worlds will be exhibited at the Mackenzie Art Gallery in Regina from August 2 to September 15, and will then tour Saskatchewan under the Mackenzie Outreach Program.

Northwest of Saskatoon, at Battleford, the twelfth annual Saskatchewan Handcraft Festival will be held on July 19, 20 and 21. As the province's major craft festival, the Saskatchewan Handcraft Festival will feature 63 indoor booths selling the jewellery, weaving, pottery, photography, prints, leathercraft, stained glass and native crafts of the juried, actively marketing members of the Saskatchewan Craft Council. The Saskatchewan Craft Council's annual juried exhibition will be held in conjunction with the festival and later will be displayed at Regina's Rose-mont Art Gallery from August 7 to August 31.

Mennonite Relief Auction
Quilts will highlight the Mennonite Central Committee Alberta sixth annual Relief Auction and Bazaar in Coldale, Alberta, on Saturday July 20. Items on the block at the bi-annual event are handcrafted originals and antique pieces donated for the sale.

In previous auctions, quilt fanciers have bid as high as $1,000 for these treasures. This year, organizers anticipate at least seventy quilts will be contributed to their sale. Designs vary according to current styles, but the recurring theme in Alberta is the wild rose. The provincial flower has been appliqued, embroidered, stitched or quilted, always to the delight of the bidder.

Assorted pieces of handmade furniture will be up for bid, including several cedar chests. Articles vary from year to year, with quality being the only criterion for donations. In the past such items as grandfather clocks, doll houses and even a restored antique automobile have gone under the gavel.

The auction is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m. A catalogue will be available the evening before the sale. All proceeds from the event will assist the Committee's relief efforts in Third World countries.

Two Centennials
This year marks the centennial of two of Canada's institutions - the Canadian Pacific Railway and the National Parks System.
Seeing more of these treasures is not altogether a bad thing. Among the splendours are 20 old Dutch flower paintings now on show, which were a beautiful and generous gift from the estate of Alice W. Stuart. In addition, don't miss the showing of the extensive collection of Chinese costumes which form a display of unparalleled luxury. On exhibit until August 11 are about 50 regal dragon robes, opera costumes studded with mirrors, and an ancient "lappet" necklace ornamented with carved jades and iridescent kingfisher feathers.

Open Space has enjoyed an exciting period since Michael Harding came in as curator of visual art in October, 1983. His projects have included Urban Targets, Beyond the Malahat and the original Artlink. Thousands of newcomers have made their way to Open Space and art activity has been stirred up throughout the length and breadth of the island. Last Thursday's opening of a group show was also Harding's swan song. "I've been fired," he explained, "brutally fired." Actually his position was terminated by the board of directors because there hasn't been money to pay him for some time now.

In any case the style of management at 510 Fort Street is bound to change. Historically, Open Space has been ruled by committee. In recent years Harding demonstrated what could be achieved when one dynamic individual decided what to show. For next season the board of directors will bring in guest curators for one show at a time.

These political considerations notwithstanding, Harding's last curatorial project is a good one. Ted Polkinghorne is an intelligent and historically aware artist. Though known for his large abstract paintings, this time he offers us a sort of film set. We are invited to look through a camera which points through a picture frame into an artificial room at a group of objects arranged on a table. The relationship between the real world and this still life of art seems to be the subject. By the dozens of references to art history which Polkinghorne has built into this construction, the meaning of art is neatly evoked.

In addition, Phyllis Serota's latest, largest paintings are hung for all to enjoy. She has created Esmerelda and the Fish in the colourful comfortable forms we've come to love. Have you ever seen a girl cuddle a fish?

Finally, there's Mandad. It seems rare, here on the west coast, to find anyone naive enough and yet sufficiently obsessive to create "folk art." This Mandad is an original, an artist who works with smashed auto glass and coloured silicone sealant. There's no real theme to his work but some of the items are deliciously playful. His Logical Nonsense Man is just begging for a punch on the nose.

Altogether, an engaging exhibition.

A two metre model of the Royal Hudson locomotive and a 3.6 metre model of the trans-Pacific linear Empress of Asia are just two of the features of this surprisingly varied exhibit which resonates the sights— and sounds — of the CPR. Surveys, trestle construction and the Chinese contribution are each the subject of special displays while along the walls are the period posters and brochures that lured tourists to travel by rail. More than just a railway, the Canadian Pacific became as a transportation link to the Orient for the mail and commerce of the British Empire.

Branch lines, interior lake steamers, and even airliners are part of the story. China table settings from club cars and steamships, furniture and fashions of the period all give a touch of elegance and add relevance for the millions who will see the exhibit. Of particular interest is a number of paintings by Canadian artists sponsored by the CPR in its early years that depict the splendors of British Columbia.

Recreating all the sights— and sounds — of the CPR

Out in front of Victoria's harbourside Museum stands British Columbia's oldest steam locomotive, "Old Curly." Built in 1869 in the USA, it was brought to British Columbia by Andrew Oxenford, construction contractor for the CPR. The 35-ton saddle tank locomotive is on loan from Burnaby Heritage Village.

Since the opening of the exhibition, another highly symbolic artifact has been added. It is a railway spike driven at Craigellachie, near Revelstoke, to complete the trans-Canada line.

This "last" spike, like millions of others used in the construction, was made of iron. When Donald A. Smith, later Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal, attempted to drive the symbolic spike, he bent it with the first blow of his sledge hammer. This bent spike was pulled up, and a substitute was driven home in its place. Although a few spikes have been said to be the "last" spike, it is impossible to prove if any are the actual one driven on November 7, 1885.

Fortunately, the bent spike, the second-to-last spike, was given to Smith and has remained with the family ever since. It is this spike that is displayed, through the courtesy of the present Lord Strathcona, great-grandson of Smith.

The spike has some small pieces cut out of it. Lord Strathcona had jewelled pins made from these chips commemorating the cabin tastes and their wives.

The New Highway to the Orient will be open to the public until the end of 1985.

I'M HANDY with a submachine gun. I can use a lance, bow, saber and pistol either mounted or on foot. A hobby interest as a university student in archaic weapons followed by some time in the infantry has provided me with a set of skills not commonly found in provincial government employees.

Mind you, I can't say it has done me much good. Oh sure, I sleep a bit better with my samurai sword by the bed. (I also have a pump shotgun, but while people still respect sharp steel, they are so accustomed to seeing firearms (authentically used on TV that I can just imagine some idiot intruder trying to kick a shotgun out of my hands with a trick move he saw once on "The A Team."

All this makes it difficult for me to watch mayhem in the movies without spitting up my popcorn.

I don't mind the violence as much as I mind its misrepresentation. Too often the impossible is presented as merely difficult and the unlikely as the norm. Credibility is rare. Since directorial zeal so often sacrifices realism for a hyperbolic, lurid machismo— and thus ruins the film for me — I thought I'd take this chance to share with you some technical trivia. That way they can be ruined for you, too.

Firstly, firearms have to be fed. Revolvers carry six rounds. Dirty Harry makes the point nicely in one of his movies ("Did I take five shots or six?... Do you feel lucky today, punk?"). But it is too often forgotten. Rifles and shotguns are good for up to about eight shots, sometimes as many as twenty. In all cases, anyone who carries a firearm and respects to use it carries lots of extra ammunition, heavy and bulky though it is.

ONE OF the great cultural treasures of any region is a fine regional painter. Christopher Pratt sums up the down-east feeling for some people, and Allen Sapp has recorded the Prairie feeling as has no one else. Since the death of Emily Carr the west coast hasn't developed one distinct stylist who expresses the landscape— with the exception of the remarkable E.J. Hughes.

And yet Hughes is virtually unknown on Vancouver Island, his lifelong home and exclusive subject. Two reasons account for this. He is a noted recluse and has avoided interviews and openings entirely for years. And, since 1951, he has sold all his work through one dealer only, the Dominion Gallery of Montreal. His careful and patient paintings are in Canada's greatest art collections, the National Gallery and all the rest, but few can afford to hang his works in their home.

Even so, Hughes' carefully considered images can show us new ways to perceive his region. At long last a retrospective exhibition and fine catalogue will acquaint the country with this remarkable painter. Hughes was born in 1913 and studied art in Vancouver. Working on the few mural commissions available in the 1930s led him to an appointment as a war artist. His brilliant war work was part of the opening exhibit at Vancouver's new Art Gallery. After an honourable discharge he continued working, methodically building straightforward compositions which mainly depict Vancouver Island. Man in nature is his unvarying theme and though his apparently simple approach has led some to call his work primitive or naive it is without doubt deep, sophisticated and well-crafted.

Hughes is still painting and may continue to be almost a hermit. But as a result of this tour his work will take its rightful place in the hearts of Canadians as a clear look at the land they love.

E.J. HUGHES RETROSPECTIVE
Art Gallery of Greater Victoria
to April 29, 384-4101
Artful dollars: Robert Vanderleelie will be opening Victoria's newest art gallery late in September, and this young and energetic entrepreneur isn't at all daunted by the mood of anxiety prevalent among Victoria's gallery owners. "We've been through it all in the last two years," he says, referring to the successful gallery he operates in Edmonton. Visual Arts Newsletter of Alberta says that the operation "has gained a reputation for presenting challenging and progressive contemporary Canadian art" and we can expect to see many of the same artists presented here.

Prairie artists such as Quentin Caron, Ann Clarke, and Ed Epp will be introduced here, and Vanderleelie has already begun meeting B.C. artists, with an eye to showing them in Edmonton. In addition, a tasty garnish of the "old masters" of modern art will add tone to what promises to be a thoroughly professional gallery. Vanderleelie's first solo artist showing will feature the work of Victorian Loraine Stephanson. Although some artists keep a low profile, the convivial Stephanson regularly brightens the day for patrons of the Demitasse restaurant, of which she is the co-owner.
Looking over Emily Carr's shoulder

FIELD SKETCHES TO FINISHED WORKS.
Emily Carr Gallery, 1107 Wharf Street, until Oct. 26. 387-3080

VICTORIA IS the home of an art museum unique in Canada. Seven years ago, the Provincial Archives of British Columbia set up a harbourfront gallery entirely dedicated to the work of one artist—Emily Carr. This richly appointed gallery features not just a static arrangement of Carr's best known work. Rather, an ongoing study of all aspects of Carr's work is presented in shows which change every six months.

By now we've all seen the masterworks which form the Emily Carr Trust, the collection which is housed at the Vancouver Art Gallery. Victoria's own Newcombe Collection is quite different. A large number of sketches and paintings were collected by Carr's friend William Newcombe for their anthropological interest rather than their artistic merit. This group consists largely of unfinished items—field sketches, rough drafts or abandoned attempts.

Curator of the gallery, Kerry Dodd, has learned over the years how to show this Newcombe Collection to its best advantage. At the moment 10 "pairs" of paintings are on show, combining sketches with the finished paintings that resulted. To do so Dodd has brought back Carr's best work, paintings Carr sold during her lifetime to the National Gallery in Ottawa, Hart House, and the Art Gallery of Ontario in Toronto. Thus we have a rare—if not unique—chance to see these superb works in Victoria once again.

The gallery succeeds in the difficult task of representing Carr for those who are seeing her work for the first time as well as pleasing those who've "seen it all before." And it is of special value to artists who will appreciate the process by which Carr transformed her paintings. Her sketches are dazzling in their freshness, and as they were intended for her eyes only we share the special intimacy of "looking over her shoulder." Changes are evident in the colour schemes of the finished oils; the compositions are more considered and figure groups are added.

For her next show, Dodd will borrow famous pictures by the Group of Seven, the very ones which inspired Emily Carr in 1931. They'll be matched with Carr's own work of the time. The Group of Seven works will come from Ontario's McMichael Collection, and in return McMichael curator Ian Thom (late of the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria) is borrowing Emily Carr's portraits for a special showing there.

For those who think they know all about Emily Carr, or who think the Emily Carr Gallery is only for tourists, the exhibit Field Sketches to Finished Works should come as a pleasant surprise.

COMING BACK from a fourth place finish in the Best Sculpture category last year, Victoria’s Sandblasters hit the beach once again for the 7th annual Canadian Open Sand Castle Competition at White Rock, B.C. The event, which attracted an estimated 150,000 fans, featured over 150 teams competing for $18,500 in prizes in six categories.

The Sandblasters started building castles three years back, “just for the fun of it,” notes team captain Fred Dobbs. But now he and nine buddies are taking it seriously. Among the 10 are three artists and two pastry chefs, but really the only requirement is a willingness to plan and work together—and given the tonnage of sand involved, no 7-pound weaklings are allowed.

For their first competition the Sandblasters built a huge typewriter, and last year they used the standard 40 by 40-foot plot to create a scene of Pinocchio in a rowboat, surrounded by whales. This year’s subject was Victoria’s Parliament Buildings, 16 feet across at the base with Captain Vancouver’s head five feet in the air.

Every sand castle starts with a shovel and pail, but the team also brought along plywood forms. After two hours were spent compacting bucket loads of moistened sand, the carving began. Using templates, they hastened to complete the elaborate facade and some of the domes. Dinner knives, spatulas and paintbrushes were called into service, and for a finishing touch letters spelling “Welcome to Victoria” were countersunk into the sand and filled with rose petals. All this took four hours and then... the in-sweeping tide dissolved the legislature, and all the other sculptures along with it.

Judges had been watching throughout the afternoon to see that no mechanical devices were used, and that no adhesives were added— a cement “sand castle” just isn’t cricket. Some contestants do get a bit carried away with powdered paint and tiny flags but our Sandblasters are purists in that respect. They did, though, employ a five-gallon sprayer to keep the Legislature from drying out too fast.

The 43 contestants in the Best Sculpture category raced to a tight finish. The Sandblasters, despite their matching team shirts, weren’t in the top three, but they “felt really strong in the end,” according to team member George Graham. “I was really surprised that we actually pulled it off and got it looking somewhat presentable.” The grand winners were a team from Sandy, er, San Diego who created an eight foot high Viking warlord in a chariot pulled by a brace of vicious polar bears.

And next year? The Sandblasters will be back. First they’ll take in the contest in Oregon as observers, then use the meet at Parksville for practice, and finally take another try at the Canadian Open.

ART AND THE CATHEDRAL

Christ Church Cathedral Memorial Hall, Victoria, British Columbia
by Robert Amos

In the searching and celebration of the Christian Life there are many types of expression. Words and music are our constant companions in church, but those artists who work toward a visual epiphany are rarely met with. Many among us labour away quietly, painting and drawing, exploring their faith. Art and the Cathedral brought forward dozens of these artists so that their meditations might become better known and act as a catalyst to our Christianity.

From May 26 until June 9, 1985, the Memorial Hall of Christ Church Cathedral in Victoria was the site of the exhibition which drew some six hundred spectators. More than fifty artists participated, and in addition lectures on art were presented.

The artists had been requested to bring forth work with a Christian theme and quite a range was on display. The first item met with in the show was a small icon-style painting of the storm on the Sea of Galilee, wherein Christ is the calm centre of His group of disciples. This was interpreted by Sechelt's Elizabeth Low. Close by were two elaborately ornamented depictions of the Blessed Virgin Mary by Muriel Willard. Also included was the more traditional appeal of Madonna at Prayer by Pat Gough. In a more modern vein was a "construction" by Paul Rode. This involved a wooden box which housed a painting of the Holy Land, a model of a primitive house from Bible times, and a large round stone. A line of scripture from the Book of Job completed this thought-provoking sculpture.

Some people chose to depict the wonders of God's creation—the birds and the beasts of Darlene Churcher, the sheep made to lie down in green pastures by Ross Pomeroy. Others attempted to capture an image of transcendence, as exemplified by The Shower of Grace, a hanging plexiglass structure created by Jacqueline Cornford. A pastel by Elizabeth Goward explored the same theme. Images of Christ Himself were numerous and featured Him in the Garden of Gethsemane, on the cross, and also on Pandora Street outside Victoria's Mustard Seed Church. The Parish of Salt Spring Island loaned all fifteen of their paintings of the stations of the Cross, a series done by Caroline Hamilton.

Clerical stoles, models of stained glass windows and paintings of churches had their place too. Though perhaps only marginally illustrating a Christian theme, a lovely little painting of the garden of the Deanery of Christ Church Cathedral by Colin Patte deserves mention. Carole Sabiston's imposing altar frontal is seen only briefly in the Cathedral itself during the short period of Advent, but this show offered the perfect chance for all to enjoy its gorgeous colours.

Larger and more abstract works created a striking effect in the hall (which had been newly washed and painted for the event). Harry Stanbridge is a widely known abstract painter whose faith is the dynamic force behind his large canvases. Their luminous counterpoint encourages discussion of the ineffable. Perhaps the most gently provocative of all were three paintings with a circus motif by Jim Gordaner. Many viewers wondered what was meant by a picture of Jesus crucified among the jugglers and the clowns but this metaphor, in bold colour and strong form, offers poetry and, to some, inspiration.

Linda Kyle, the driving force behind the exhibition, set her sights very high, and mounted a show of real artistic integrity, yet with a place in it for Sunday School art too. Credit is also due to the many helpers both within the congregation and the wider community. No one was turned away for lack of professional polish and it was not at all necessary to be a "card-carrying Christian" to participate. In the end the show provided a lot to think on—about the artists' search and the forms which revelation can take. Next year's edition is eagerly awaited.

"It's not going to be one of those hoity-toity scratch-your-chin kind of art shows," says artist Paul Dishaw. The gargoyles looming over Fort Street give fair warning that Deep Space (at Open Space, 510 Fort Street) is going to be fun. Dishaw, a painter who has worked extensively in set design, and Joan Wilkinson, a sculptor most recently seen at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria's invitational show in July, are collaborating on a multimedia installation. The theme is "space travel, outer space, life on other planets, and the deep space within us all," says Dishaw. Already two nine-foot tall "creeps" and a host of little creeps have invaded the town and there's lots more to come—sculpture, wall painting, lighting effects, and a giant opening party in collaboration with Event!, the arts-business promotional campaign that starts the same day (September 27 at 8 pm). —R. Street festival takes over

Artists, musicians, poets, dancers...take it to the streets in Chinatown for a five-day festival combining the visual and performing arts with the colourful heritage of Victoria's Chinese community. (Chinatown Street scene by Robert Adam)

by Barbara Little

Victoria's magnificent Chinatown gate becomes a prosenium arch this weekend.
The Gate of Harmonious Interest will frame a stage that will highlight the first annual Chinatown Street Festival of the Arts, August 1-5. With the gate a stage, Figared Street will be closed to traffic making it a true pedestrian mall. Besides the entertainment there will be artists painting on site, artists living in the area will open their studios, and there will be a variety of sales and demonstrations booths, all creating a colourful atmosphere.

While the Asian Lion Dancers take to the street to celebrate their culture, upstairs in Don Mee's Restaurant musical strains from a cabaret-style evening will be overhead. And throughout the five-day gala happening, street musicians will serenade Chinatown visitors.

A display of Chinatown's archives, a bonsai exhibition in Buckerfield's store, and 26 artists' studios will be open to the public. Artists will be at work outdoors on eight-foot-square panels during the holiday weekend. A honeycomb tenement building, buried behind stores and alleys has been revitalized for the festival.

Most of the events are free, only Don Mee's cabaret and the O.A.P. Hall have paid admissions.

The Idea is Born
The idea was seeded by the Bank Art annual exhibition. Like the tentacles on an octopus, various support events have grown, using the original theme. It took a committee of six determined people to put together the last two months, as in any project of this size, have been justifiably hectic for the adventurous founders. They are introducing a unique concept in a city which already has more festivals than it can count...each one totally different. Continued on page 7

Victoria leads B.C. in Summer Games

The fifth Canada Summer Games will be held in St. John, New Brunswick, August 11-24 with $18.3 million in funding from all three levels of government —federal, provincial (New Brunswick) and municipal (St. John). The St. John 1985 Canada Summer Games Society has built an aquatic centre, a 400-metre all-weather track, and improved other existing facilities.

Of the 326 B.C. athletes that will be competing in the games (all 22 and under), the largest contingent will come from the Victoria area. Nineteen 1985 Canada Games distance coach, Ron Bowker, who is the B.C. Canada Games distance coach, believes there will be a "strong improvement in the middle-distance events."

Nine Victoria runners will participate representing the Vikes Racing Team and the Victoria Track and Field Club. Bowker notes that the Victoria Track and Field Club are from the Victoria Track and Field Club.

Vikes 1500-metre star, 19-year-old Steve Bachop finished sixth in his last national race and second in the B.C. Canada Games trials.

David Coey heads the 3000-metre steeplechase coming in first in the provincial team trials with a time of 9:13.8. Continued on page 3

CHINATOWN FESTIVAL

Hopes for a permanent annual event run high, and with reason. "The support of local visual and aural artists, the Chinese community and volunteers with vision and energy, have made the concept a realization," says committee member and participating artist, Robert Amos.

He has high praise for Louis Izuante. "His skills as operations manager of Chinatown are gargantuan and he has come through in planning every detail in the preparation stages."

Spectral Visions Sunlight Show

The Old Age Pensioners Hall, on Government is to be a hub of visual and aural activity. The Bardic Union of Victoria and the Spectral Visions Sunlight Show are co-producing a sound and light spectacle in the old building. The Eric Pittman Spectral Visions Show, Laser Light, Interpretive Dance by Zave Reinhart and Company, the Goddamm Light Show, theatre and related performances will run continuously. A special "3-D" gigantic screen will be used in the hall.

Where it's all going to happen: The Gate of Harmonious Interest will frame an outdoor stage on Fisgard Street for the Chinatown Street Festival, August 1-5, network by Robert Amos.

Deborah Hazime agreed, "I have the chance to share my large installation art with the public. My art relates today. Izuante and his associates envision the rediscovered tenements as permanent artists' studios in the future.

David Lai, instrumental in procuring the magnificent gates and the street decor, that goes along with it, and artist Andy Simons triggered the idea of a Chinatown festival in Izuante's mind. As it turned out, both had called him, independently, on the same day, looking for new promotional ideas. Thus, in Eastern fashion, a marriage was arranged between the Victoria artists and the Chinese community. That was just four short months ago.

Reading through the weekend proposal, witnessing the enthusiasm and energy of the organization, and visiting the attractive set gives positive waves of a flowing project.

"Chinatown" is an alternative festival, one based on today's world rather than on Picasso, Beethoven, Radames or Bach. It shows what our artists with fresh thoughts can do in receptive Asian community.

Special Events

Planned for the O.A.P. are an Art Party on Thursday evening (August 1), and a rock and roll dance on Saturday with Backstreet. The Bardic Union present a Poetry Cabaret on Sunday night, where poets of today read their gems of wisdom. The B.C. Holiday has a film and video celebration on the schedule.

Many of Victoria's visual artists, looking for recognition, will have their day in the sun. The "Chinatown" package is attractive enough to draw people from all walks of life. Informality allows a chance for communications with the creators as you journey through the studios and street.

An on-site visit to the festival's Fisgard setting gave me the chance to interview Luis Izuante in his Chinatown hideaway behind Fan Tan Alley. Artists Robert Amos, Deborah Hazime and several of their colleagues, wandered by during the interview.

"We want to produce free-flowing art without fear of qualitative judgements," explained Izuante. "Our works will bring the context alive as you watch.

"We are making a social statement beyond the painting you see on a gallery wall. It's arts alive," he said.

Victoria's Chinatown has radically changed from the days when half of Victoria's population was Chinese

By ROBERT AMOS

The guardian lions on the Gate of Harmonious Interest were gifts from Suzhou, Victoria's sister city in China.

Chinatown as we know it was a response to an alien and hostile environment. For the Chinese, Victoria was at once a menace and a lure. The Port of Victoria was an administrative and recreational home base to which immigrants from all over British Columbia could return, either temporarily or, if determined to stay, migrate back from China.

Until 1876, immigration regulations, the rights or status of the Chinese had not addressed by the Canadian government through the Chinese consular general in San Francisco. The consular generals, in sum, arranged for Chinese merchants to form the Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association (CCBA), which was established in 1876, opening their headquarters building on August Street. The new association went into relief work with enthusiasm, initiating a drive for funds and setting up a central food kitchen for the most needy. Over the next two years, 7,000 Chinese were repatriated. In Victoria, classes were given in tailoring, shoemaking, and farming. The "graduates" were sent to other communities all across Canada. Later projects undertaken by the CCBA included the Chinese hospital, the cemetery and a free school. The carved and gilded "joss house" or shrine was brought from China and set up on the top floor of the Association building.

The association was de facto Chinese government in Canada. The CCBA was set up to eliminate oppression by westerners and abolish discriminatory laws. It acted, and continues to act, as arbitrator, protector and benefactor. As well, the CCBA provided a court of appeal for matters within the Chinese community and presented a united front to deal more effectively with the obstacles of the new world.

The Chinese hospital was given a permanent home in 1899. The funds to build it were provided by the CCBA and it was maintained by an extra legal "tax". Each Chinese who could afford to return to his homeland was deemed wealthy enough to pay the $2 hospital tax at an exit visa. An official of the CCBA checked the "visas" at the wharf.

On certain occasions the Chinese would step out. Funeral processions were the object of much interest in Victoria, when costumed musicians paraded by on their way to the distant cemetery. As the cortège moved slowly in its way, sideburns would protrude along the cubes scattering thousands of pieces of thin yellow paper, each pierced with many holes. (It was said that a pursuing devil would be slowed...
The aura of the "secrets of Chinatown" was, perhaps, not a mysterious cover for a barbaric demi-monde, but rather a protection against the intrusion of "white devils" full of indignation against a people they did not understand.

The Chinese-Canadian community was almost entirely built on eastern Canadian contacts who supplied laudanum, cocaine and morphine until the late 1900s. The discriminatory laws against the Chinese were passed at the insistence of white drug dealers for their own profits. Opium was legally manufactured in Canada until 1911.

The aura of the "secrets of Chinatown" was, perhaps, not a mysterious cover for a barbaric demi-monde, but rather a protection against the intrusion of "white devils" full of indignation against a people they did not understand.
The distinctly Oriental apartments grew quiet. Housekeeping rooms along wide hallways echoed with footsteps of grand-children visiting from the suburbs.

By the late 1970s there were fewer than 100 residents in Victoria’s Chinatown. Indigenous remnants could still be found: the antiquated truck of the vegetable man, the bean sprout farm in the basement of Morley’s, a few of the older generation gathering in the afternoon at Main Yack Yong Herball.

As the old ways faded, the tenements were being cleared of a century’s accumulation of partitions and debris by artists and craftsmen who slowly filled the available spaces. These young people were attracted by low rents and the picturesque surroundings. Woodworkers, painters, and screen printers brought their own spirit of community and a new cultural life. Chinatown more and more served a non-resident Chinese populace and non-Chinese residents. It would have been easy to forget the character and traditions of this authentic and long-established community. It was discredited and misunderstood. But the special vision of Dr. Chuen-Yen David Lai saved this chapter of heritage from destruction. In 1979 he made a report on Chinatown to the City of Victoria Planning Commission. In it he catalogued the “heritage” buildings, the special functions and the character of this overlooked historic neighbourhood. Through his persuasive ness and persistence, a foolish began—facades were painted, overhead wires removed, distinctive sidewalks, lamps and trees installed. The centrepiece of the project was the Gate of Harmonious Interest. Through an extraordinary conjunction of private gifts and government funds (amounting to $248,000) a remarkable archway was commissioned. The colourful cladding, with dragons and phoenixes, and the glazed roof tiles were supplied from Taiwan. The erection of this decree, on a steel frame, was handled with enthusiasm by the Victoria City works crew. Two large stone guardian lions arrived as a gift from Victoria’s sister city in China, Suzhou. In 1981 the gate was officially opened and immediately began to lure visitors to Victoria’s north ward. The huge gate is 55 feet wide and 38 feet high, spanning Flag staff at Government Street, the focus of Chinatown.

Less dramatic, but in no way less significant, the Chinatown Care Centre was entirely rebuilt. In 1962, an unmarried labourer named Deng Gong had left $25,000 to renovate the old hospital, but even so its days were numbered. It was demolished in 1979. The indelible Lai was not content to let this hospital pass away. He made an extensive survey to prove that a hospital for the elderly in Chinatown was still valid to Victoria’s Chinese. As a result of his efforts, and with the continued action of the CCBA and all levels of government, the new Chinatown Intermediate Care Centre was opened on the same site in 1982. It is a 33-bed unit, with Chinese-speaking staff and Chinese cuisine. In the spirit of harmonious interest, it is open to all Canadians. The Chinese and non-Chinese Canadians who live there seem particularly delighted with the arrangements.

Surely there is more to come. Chinatown is once again a colourful, intriguing and very different sort of place. Once it was a ghetto for newcomers, but now it is a heritage area. We must acknowledge that the Chinese have been here longer than most of us. Once it was a ward of mystery and rumoured danger, but now we prize its intense intimacy, its human scale and its untangling service as a commercial centre for a large community. Looking back on their history, the Chinese Canadians have no reason to be especially thankful to the other Canadians for the treatment they received. Yet now they can be proud. Their perseverance was rewarded with success, honour and full participation in Canadian society — and the special neighbourhood that keeps their urban presence alive.

Iff « The Island is a great creative environment— that's why a lot of outstanding graphic artists and illustrators choose to live here rather than in the metro markets you'd expect to see their work in.” With those words, Island Illustrators 1986, a compendium work by 23 local graphic designers, comes hot off the press and into the hands of art directors far and wide.

It’s a handsome book, a bit like the Graphis Annual in design, and contains excellent reproductions in colour and black and white by the likes of Soren Henrich, Anna Mah, Ken Eisner, Kevin Ade, and Darlene Churcher. If you want art “made to order” this is your catalogue of the talent available ($10 from Island Illustrators, #202-1619 Store St., Victoria, V8W 3K3).

An even more extensive look at this most satisfying realm of commercial art is on show at North Park Gallery until September 26 (1619 Store St.). Original art work together with the published version is displayed by dozens of artists. Of particular note are the exceptionally precise renderings by Ron Lightburn, plenty of good airbrush stylings from Steve Milroy, and the gorgeous, happy mixed media paintings by Grant Leier.

The organizers deserve much praise for this very well produced show. Parents take note: it is a superb introduction to graphic arts for students. And it is an eye-opener for those people who prefer magazines to art galleries. —R. A.
NEW BOOKS

Where, oh where was this book years ago when I was first taken by rugs?

Things of beauty in themselves, rugs have served to enhance large and small spaces, and to cover doorway, floors, walls, cushions, furniture, and cliffs. In the Middle East they have covered terraces or been used as hovens, saddle bags, grain and salt containers, and to pray upon. Through the ages they have been promingly depicted in the paintings of Holbein, Vermuy, Burme-Jones and Mir. During the 1940s, North America moved away from "orientals" as floor coverings, for wall-to-wall broadloom better served the taste for fashionable monochromatic decor. Happily, today, there has been a resurgence of interest in these rugs, or "orientals." Caroline Bosly's Rugs to Riches provides a succinct history of rugs and oriental rug making, and tells what to look for when embarking upon buying or collecting oriental rugs. One can "read" rugs by geographic origin, design, shape, color, weave, and quality, and outlines for the layman the problems of what to look for and where to find it. The author deals only with hand-woven rugs, and points out clearly that machine-made rugs are not to be considered "orientals."

Leading us through the labyrinth of rug lore, the book is often humorous, and at its most readable. Illustrations are plentiful, and the color plates of rug types are informative, although one could wish for a few more. The drawings of motifs and designs will help identify your rug.

Chapter Five, Windows to the Orient, will be of special help to first-time buyers, those who are not yet confident that a rug will match the rest of the room. A section points out that most reputable dealers will probably let you "borrow" a rug for a few days to see if you can live with it.

Buying a rug can be a pleasurable experience; acquiring it for a good price can add a fillip of excitement. The author's lessons in shopping and bargaining help you make this come about. Remember, good rugs do not depreciate, so those of buying for investment as well as furnishings should take heed.

There is also a nonsense, thorough section on the care, cleaning, and preservation of rugs, and a Glossary of rug terms. Rugs to Riches is a book worth reading whether or not you collect rugs, for thereafter you are armed to look at them with new eye.

A great way to discover (or rediscover) Toronto is to walk through McHugh's guide or to take to the streets with it in hand. Maps are provided for 20 walks. An architectural journalist, McHugh has used a snappy writing style to describe and inform; the former William Foss house at 203 Carlton is "fat and sassy," the former Hugh Munro house (1957) on the same street housed one of the first residence telephones in the city. A Glossary helps users define cottages, cupolas and curtain walls.

This book tells the story of the eight small villages in the Bastard and South Burgess Township, of the men and women who settled the wilderness in the Township which is a tiny part of Leeds and Grenville County: where they came from; how they coped with their personal and family tragedies; and - above all - how they created their "own four walls." The book, by the way, is the title of Thomas Carlyle's book which contains the lover letters between Carlyle and his wife, Jane Welsh. There are many people involved with the production of such a study, but thanks must go to Lady Tweedsmuir, who between 1935 and 1940, when she was wife of the Governor General of Canada, took much interest in our country's local history, particularly that of Ontario. It was with her encouragement that the individual Women's Institutes of Ontario, including those of Bastard and South Burgess, began to collect information in a series of loose-leaf binders which became known as "The Lady Tweedsmuir Books." The Women's Institutes of Dela, Philipville, Chantry, Forfar and Portland keep this information updated; the names of the women who lived in the area are added regularly, as are new members in this community.

Hardly a coffee table book, this volume, measuring 12" x 15", would be more appropriate on a library shelf. A pictorial history of early Ontario interpreted by 30 of Canada's writers and historians, it examins the French and Indian quest; the contributions of the Loyalists; the Simcoe Years; the consequences of the War of 1812; and the Rebellion of 1837. Essays deal with education, religious life, the arts, sports, social life, architecture and politics.

Gum San/Gold Mountain, seen in May and June, 1985, at the Vancouver Art Gallery, was a landmark exhibition of photographs by Edwin B. "Chinn" Tilt. The gallery guide to the exhibition, Gum San/Gold Mountain, is the first book to be published by the Art Gallery in Chinese and English. It presents with the intimacy of a photo album superb reproductions of sixty telling photographs by and of Vancouver's Chinese-Canadians between 1886 and 1947. In addition, there is a brief history of the Chinese in Canada and a number of cogent essays on the function of photography in this community.

As an exhibit Gum San/Gold Mountain has brought thousands of new visitors to the Vancouver Art Gallery, many of whom will go back to their elders and photo albums with renewed interest. And for the others who didn't see the show, this very handsome book will retain its work of healing and integration.

Deep Space is the name of Open Space Gallery's new exhibition, on display at 501 Fort Street (383-6963). The opening party on September 27 at 8 pm will also serve as the launching of Frott's week-long celebration. Event! The art show is a multi-media total environment, a vision of space travel, outer space, distant planets and the inner space of all of us as well. The whole gallery will be utilized by the creative powers of artists Paul Dishaw and Joan Wilkinson. This will be an opening party that people will talk about for a long time!

Leafhill Galleries (47 Bastion Square, 384-1311) has made a name for itself by presenting the best of British Columbia's landscape artists. If furbabbas, headlands and wildlife studies are your cup of tea, you'll find lots to look at at Leafhill. Located in historic Bastion Square across from the Maritime Museum, it is the flagship gallery of some of our finest marine artists?

Myfanwy Pavelic is known worldwide for her Vericous portraits. Britain's National Portrait Gallery as well as the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria proudly hang her work, and it is with no small measure of pride that North Park Gallery (609 Store St., 381-3422) presents an exhibition called Relationships. This is a series of almost 100 paintings and drawings of well-known Victorian painters, poets and poets. In each case, they are portrayed in a special relationship, with husbands and wives, children, boyfriends and so on. It's a superb collection of art, and an intriguing "who's who" too.

Winchester Galleries (545 Fort Street, 598-2777) represents dozens of Victoria's most creative artists. Abstractionists, surrealists and other artists of an interpretive temperament display their work here, and during the week-long Event a representative selection will be on display.

UpTown Gallery (3400 Douglas St., 381-4341) is presenting a multi-media display of work by local artists. Included in this show are Less Finney, Will Gordon, Carol Graham, Tim Hume, Glenn Matthews, Sandra Ritter and Keith Taylor.

Fun Tan Gallery (541 Fisgard Street, 382-4424) is becoming more and more a folk art gallery, with an admixture of the best in contemporary work. Until October 10 they will be displaying Peruvian rugs of the type known as Ayacucho. Using needles and a shuttle on a small backstrap loom the Indians weave rugs with geometric pre-Inca motifs of the Huari tribe. Soft and beautiful colors are the result of dyes made from herbs and cochineal.

The mysteries of Chilkat weaving

Cheryl Samuel re-creates an art so complex that few know its secrets.

In former times Indian women of the Tsimshian and Tlingit tribe wove gorgeous garments for chiefs of great wealth. When a chief, robed in woollen leggings and a dancing apron, wrapped a five-sided chilkat blanket shawl-wise around his shoulders the long soft fringe would follow his every move. Artist and historian Bill Holm has called this "the ultimate in regal apparel."

Though not a native Indian, Cheryl Samuel of Metchosin is a weaver of superb technique and an analytical disposition. For 15 years she has unravelled the mysteries of Chilkat weaving, an art so complex and time-consuming that its practice has all but disappeared. In 1980, sponsored by the National Museums of Canada, Samuel travelled the world to examine old weavings brought from the Pacific Northwest. In addition, she has earned her skill through practice, recreating the techniques outlined in her 1982 book, The Chilkat Dancing Blanket (Pacific Search Press, $40).

When teaching in Alaska, Samuel met Delores Churchill of Ketchikan, her first apprentice. Chilkat weaving has many unique features. The warp threads are mountain goat wool and yellow cedar bark, spun on the thigh with the palm of the hand. The warp hangs from a beam and the weft is worked into it with the fingers alone. To this technique, called twining, the Indians add braiding which makes it possible to form the typical curves of Northwest Indian design. Using these two methods a low relief similar to carving is built up.

Samuel's two apprentices are working from the same design, a Chilkat dancing apron in the collection of the Pitt Rivers Museum in Oxford, England. Usually the designs come from patterns painted in black on smooth cedar planks. "If you get a pattern board, it demands weaving," say the weavers. This demand entails an uncommon amount of work.

When Samuel gives workshops her pupils might weave a "ghost pouch"—not much bigger than a mitten—in five long days. After five months of work, Delores Churchill has almost finished her first apron. Like Ulysses' Penelope, she unravelled quite a bit at first. "I was working for perfection, but there's no perfection in Chilkat. We're all human," she notes. This weaving isn't the rhythmic calming sort, throwing the shuttle back and forth. It's really a science, an incredible intellectual exercise.

The aprons in progress can look like a telephone repairman's nightmare. The technique itself is complex, but getting the designs to fall into place is much more difficult. Old blankets are studied minutely—in photographs and museums—to learn the secrets of Chilkat which Samuel calls "one of the most controlled, yet freest, forms of tapestry ever developed." The women who made the first blankets are their constant inspiration. As Edna Jackson explains, "You want to honour them by doing the best you possibly can."
Paul Rode is one of Victoria's best underground artists. This doesn't refer to a penchant for painting down manholes, in subway stations, or in caves. It means, 'says art critic Robert Amos, 'that the artist works, not through the auspices of an established gallery, but prefers instead to show his work, to enlighten the public, in other ways."

Paul Rode does not show in galleries because, as he says, 'I don't want to play the games you have to play to do that. I don't want to spend hundreds of dollars getting out invitations and buying wine for the opening. He smiles, shuffles his feet. 'You know, people in this part of the world don't give a shit about art. Artists should have to struggle to be seen, to get people to come and see the stuff.'

Rode has shown his work at North Park Gallery, at Open Space, and at the exhibit of Chinese art at Christ Church Memorial Hall. And those who keep an eye on The Blue Fence (for and Vancouver may have noticed and been shocked by his 'Lamentation Genocide in Lebanon' a few months ago. His most recent showing was at King Solomon's Cafe, where he has exhibited twice.

On the last day of August, Rode opened a one-man show to bear all one-man shows. The exterior walls of his house at 3452 Blanshard Street, covered with weird, often Picasso-like figures, with realistic representations of soldiers and cities, with animals awful, solid, and fierce, formed an exhibit which was billed as 'Condemned Art on a Condemned House in a Condemned World.' The figures ceremoniously.worn, flew, wept, and dreamed, seen up from the eaves right down to ground level. Stylized figures marched around door frames, covered under windows, and floated or leapt out from every inch of the plaster walls.

But they exist no more. Not that Rode was under any illusion that his paintings of Neuengroh, the portrait of Mozart, the Viennese soldier, or any of the dream-like and mythological images would be preserved for posterity. This was art made to be destroyed. Destruction of the medium is the message. "This house is the world," was uttered high on one wall. But the house and its evocative art were smashed down by a bulldozer, the architecture of one era making way for the next.

Rode's home was one of 22 in the block immediately north of the Town and Country Shopping Centre. They have all been razed to make room for— you guessed it— another shopping centre.

"Have you ever noticed," Rode asks, "run[ging] long fingers through his dark hair, "how proud people are when they show you what they've bought? Proud! As if they've made the thing themselves!" One of the paintings showed a figure on a roof, with a many-windowed yellow building behind them. They held hands, their narrow angular bodies reaching out to one another wistfully. "They are the thin people. They come into my paintings a lot," Rode says. "They are the consumers the world is full of. They are the people who buy things and buy things, just to compensate for not creating them."

On the wall facing the street was a drawing that came after the death of Jean-Jacques Rousseau, a Montreal artist and close friend whose work Paul greatly admired. It showed a body, entombed in a square of red paint, a cut-away view, with two distraught figures at the surface. The entombed body was very far away, quite unreachable, totally apart. To see it was to experience the mourners' separateness, to feel their pain. The red square was both a physical space and an emotional distance.

The two artists Paul Rode adores most are Picasso and Mozart. "Picasso because he was beyond style," he explains, "and Mozart— he died with the music racing through him, like he was a flute and the music was the breath. That's the way I want to live and paint." "I would paint," he goes on, "even if no one ever saw what I did. I have to. Rode paints on other things besides houses and fences, though he prefers board to canvas, largely because "you can paint on it now, immediately; you don't have to buy canvas and then stretch it, and board is less fragile. You can't put your foot through it. I paint by crystal," Rode says. "I paint by my feelings pour into me and out of me in one continuous flow. I try not to interpret too much, just let it come." Much of his work has a strangely primitive feel in it. He paints, not the way a dog looks, but the barking, the straining at the leash, in much the same way as a child paints, not by planning, but by the shape of the eye, but the space the figure or object occupies.

Like Cori, the famous Florentine fresco painter of the 14th century, Rode paints figures, whether abstract or realistic, that are simplified into comprehensible shapes, allowing us to feel the human drama in which they are involved.

There weren't many people at Rode's showing of condemned art. It wasn't an elegant affair. There was no free food. The grass was long underfoot, the yard was full of objects used and objects finished with. The tumble-down steps, for years in disrepair, had finally quit trying to be steps at all, and lay in splinters around the front doorway. Door itself was propped against the side of the house. A shovel leaned against a painting of a shovel.

Rode and his family have moved a few blocks away, and the condemned paintings, being exactly that, exist only for those lucky few who caught their brief existence and carry the images behind their eyes.

Michael Morris, born in 1942, grew up in Victoria as an acknowledged child prodigy. In fact, the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria preserves some of his schoolboy sketches in its permanent collection. Two years at UVic, three at the Vancouver School of Art and two more at the Slade School in London, England, brought his talents to a high level. MICHAEL MORRIS is an artist who has long been “slightly ahead of his time,” but by now Victoria should be ready for Michael Morris: Early Works, 1965-1972.

Morris, born in 1942, grew up in Victoria as an acknowledged child prodigy. In fact, the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria preserves some of his schoolboy sketches in its permanent collection. Two years at U Vic, three at the Vancouver School of Art and two more at the Slade School in London, England, brought his talents to a high level. The exhibit now on show picks out the best bits from his first seven years as a professional. London was in fine form when Morris got there, alive with challenging and energetic creativity. Hard edge abstraction, pop art (well in advance of its American manifestation), op art and the shaped canvas were all finding form, and the conceptual arts (video, performance, installations) had not yet undermined the validity of painting.

For his paintings Morris began by inking geometric grids. He then brushed them in, colouring book style, with flat poster paints. Using colour schemes from candy wrappers and neon signs, he often divided his tones for graduated “colour bar” effects. Throughout the years, these small sketches were enlarged and his tentative painting took on a machine edge. In lesser hands this technique has been a recipe for tedium but, as curator David MacWilliam points out, Morris was able to express “wry humour, intense colour, aggressive composition and intellectual detachment.”

There’s a surprisingly pleasant hint of ‘60s nostalgia in this show. “It was a period when Vancouver blossomed full-blown into the art scene,” notes MacWilliam, “aggressively cosmopolitan, without that lingering sense of provincial isolation, envied by the rest of the country and unrivaled in its energy, vitality and feeling of the times.”

Morris, in those heady days, soon became involved in a lot more than painting. A seminal figure in the world of correspondence art, he was the man behind the Image Bank postcard show and, as Miss General Idea, graced the cover of File Magazine. He set the stage for Dr. Brute and Mr. Peanut, two eccentric Vancouver performance artists, and with his friends founded the Western Front, an artists’ society in Vancouver. “At his frequent parties, he would produce and introduce artists or critics from Los Angeles, London, Paris or Milan,” remembers David Silcox. “I knew that I had stumbled upon the artistic equivalent of a telephone switching centre.”

Though now a resident of Berlin, Morris often returns to Victoria to visit his mother. His 1983 show here at the Backroom Gallery gave evidence that he is back to painting; this time the subject was naked boys in a style reminiscent of Egon Schiele. Another exhibit is planned for North Park Gallery later this year, apparently a suite of early works that Karl Spriet has been keeping in his garage for the past 25 years.

A lot of local people remember Morris and have followed his career keenly, but from a safe distance. Morris looked slightly ravaged among the healthy Victorians who came to honour the returning hero at last Thursday’s opening. Shaking a bit, and with a hint of a giggle, he gave credit for the show to guest curator David MacWilliam and referred to the two rooms of bright and inventive paintings as “only the tip of the iceberg.” More is eagerly awaited.

(Note: Morris is an artist of sufficient stature and tenacity to disobey the prophets of gloom and demand higher light levels than are normally permitted at the Gallery. It’s worth the trip just to see how the new $150,000 lighting system performs when someone has the courage to turn it up a bit.)

Paintings by Au Ho-Nien

Until October 26, the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria is exhibiting fifty paintings by Au Ho-nien, done in the Lingnan style.

Au Ho-nien is recognized by many as Taiwan's leading contemporary artist. Professor Au, who is now head of the Art Department at the Cultural University in Taipei, has been an academician at the Chinese Academy for twelve years and, for eleven years, has held the prestigious post of Hsukang Professor, which is Taiwan's foremost accolade for an artist. He is a highly respected artist throughout the world and his works, characterized by bright colours and an extremely delicate touch, have been extensively exhibited in Japan, South America, Europe and North America.

Emily Carr: Field Sketches

In Finished Works

The Newcombe Collection of the Provincial Archives contains a large number of sketches and paintings by Emily Carr. These were collected by William Arnold Newcombe primarily for their anthropological content rather than their artistic merit. The collection consists largely of unfinished items representing quick sketches, rough drafts or abandoned attempts. In this sense, as an archival collection, it provides information on how the artist worked and the stages she went through to produce finished works, as well as providing examples of her rough or preparatory works which are not generally available in other institutions oriented towards fine art.

Ten "pairs" of art works have been selected to illustrate items from the Newcombe Collection and show their association to works found in other collections. In each case the pairs illustrate separate treatments of a similar theme.

The Provincial Archives of B.C. borrowed paintings from the National Gallery of Canada, the Vancouver Art Gallery, the Art Gallery of Ontario, the Glenbow Museum, Calgary and the Hart House Permanent Collection, University of Toronto for this show. The sketches and paintings will remain on display at the Emily Carr Gallery, 1307 11th St., Victoria, until October 26.

VAG Plans Pratt Retrospective

Christopher Pratt, 49, of St. John's, Newfoundland, is one of Canada's senior artists and curator Scott Watson of the Vancouver Art Gallery is arranging his first retrospective. "Major loans have been negotiated and we expect that the exhibition will provide a rare insight into the breadth of the artist's work," says Watson.

Guest curator Professor Joyce Zemans of York University, Toronto, will be producing a major essay on Pratt for the catalogue. In addition, a poster will accompany this exhibition, which opens in Vancouver November 23, 1985 and will travel to the Art Gallery of Ontario, Toronto, Memorial University Art Gallery, St. John's, Newfoundland, and Dalhousie Art Gallery in Halifax.

Grant Helps Preserve

50 Years of Ship Photos

A grant of $3,000 from the Provincial Heritage Trust enabled a University of British Columbia student to work during the summer months on a collection of 20,000 negatives of ships, a gift three years ago to the Vancouver Maritime Museum from the World Ship Society, Vancouver Division.

The collection, which Len McCann, curator at the Museum, refers to as a remarkable one for any port, represents negatives of photographs taken of almost every ship entering the Port of Vancouver from the early twenties to 1982. The photographs are the work of several photographers, who set up their cameras at Prospect Point in Stanley Park. Over the years, their collections were acquired by the World Ship Society, Vancouver Division and are the work of the Ship Photographers, who set up their cameras at Prospect Point in Stanley Park. Novelty shakers became popular after the First World War when the traditional glass and silver were displaced by such cheaper and more easily available materials as plastic, wood and chinaware. The salt and pepper shakers on display at the Dunlop until September 15 were selected from a local collection, begun 50 years ago, of over 1500 pairs.

Regina Views

Gently easing Regina's Dunlop Art Gallery into the seriousness of September is Great Shakes, an exhibit of 240 pairs of salt and pepper shakers in the Central display case.

That the most inventive designs are often applied to the most utilitarian objects is evidenced by works in this Dunlop exhibit: shakers vary from a pair of intricate pagodas to a pair of RCA Victor dogs, from two washing machines to matched covered wagons, and from a pair of chefs to the paired fruits and vegetables with which they work.

Plant and animal designs in salt and pepper shakers have become common in the 1880s, and by the 1900s this fascination with mimetic shapes expanded to include shaker designs replicating any object, animate or inanimate. Following Great Styles in the Central display cases will be Saskatchewan失手, an exhibition of Saskatchewan workshops, novels, cookbooks, books of poetry and children's stories illustrated by Saskatchewan artists and organized by the Dunlop Art Gallery to coincide with Saskatchewan Easy Library Week October 19 to 26.

From September 21 to October 26 at the Central Library Gallery of the Dunlop Art Gallery is Richard Gorecki: Paintings. A survey of his recent work, this exhibition reveals Gorekno's irreverent and sardonic view of the modern world. Gorenko works with a deliberately low-key palette, incorporating drawing and printmaking techniques in his painting, and keeping visual elements to a minimum.

At the Norman Mackenzie Art Gallery in Regina from September 13 to October 27 in The Second Generation: Fourteen Saskatchewan Painters, an exhibition includes two to four works by each of the following artists: David Alexander, Garry Berteig, Norm Dallin, Ed Epp, Rich Gorenko, Marie Lanzon, and Alicia Popoff of Saskatoon; Bob Boyer, Jerry Didur, Donna Knecht, Bill Perrault and David Thauberger of Regina; Grant Hardy of Meacham and Tom O'Flanagan of Amqui.

The first generation of contemporary Saskatchewan painters has been dominated by such artists as Ken Lochhead, Art McKay, and Ted Godwin in Regina, and William Pehrshoff, Otto Rogers and Dorothy Knowles in Saskatoon. They were among the first artists in this province to consciously address the issues of modernism in the 1950s and 1960s and they deliberately sought out international trends and incorporated them.

For the second generation of Saskatchewan artists, previous influences have been affected by new issues and attitudes of the 1970s and 1980s. The works in this exhibition, all executed over the past three years, indicate that some artists are directly addressing new artistic modes and styles, while others tend to be working within the more established traditions of Saskatchewan painting.

The first generation of contemporary Saskatchewan painters has been dominated by such artists as Ken Lochhead, Art McKay, and Ted Godwin in Regina, and William Pehrshoff, Otto Rogers and Dorothy Knowles in Saskatoon. They were among the first artists in this province to consciously address the issues of modernism in the 1950s and 1960s and they deliberately sought out international trends and incorporated them.

For the second generation of Saskatchewan artists, previous influences have been affected by new issues and attitudes of the 1970s and 1980s. The works in this exhibition, all executed over the past three years, indicate that some artists are directly addressing new artistic modes and styles, while others tend to be working within the more established traditions of Saskatchewan painting.
Make it new
PAINTINGS BY AU HO-NIEN: Art Gallery of Greater Victoria. 1040 Moss Street, until October 6. 384-4101.

THROUGH THE great peace of mountains the chopping of a solitary woodcutter rises in the air, underscored by the distant roar of a waterfall. This mood is conveyed by a huge scroll, painted by Taiwan's greatest living artist, Au Ho-nien.

To coincide with the opening of his one-man show at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, Au was recently in Victoria. Born in 1935, he is director of the Taipei University of Chinese Culture and chairman of the Chinese Academy of Art there. A bright-eyed, vital man, he is dressed for the interview in a neat suit and grey silk shirt. Only the two long whiskers growing from a mole on his cheek correspond to one's notions of the Chinese scholar-painter; that, and the animation with which his hands punctuate his speech.

Au is the leader of the Lingnan "school of painting," a modern tradition which takes nature as its teacher and relays on the artist's own intelligence to supersede all that has come before. The colourful, dramatic paintings he produces are among the most accessible work in the whole panoply of Chinese painting. Victorians familiar with the late, well-beloved Stephen Lowe will recognize this style of painting. It is based on the traditional brush-modes of Chinese painting, yet revels in luscious, fluid colour, sweeping perspective, and a catholicity of subject matter, in sharp contrast to the cool, intellectual idealism of so much Chinese painting. Lingnan paintings are suffused with powerful emotional content.

Historically, Chinese artists of a thousand years ago imbued all the elements of nature with emotion. Later the Chinese artists of Southern and Northern Sung schools produced increasingly mild work, bound by tradition. Emotion was discredited as mere sentimentality. Japanese paintings, influenced by Chinese art through the Zen tradition, continued the "emotional" style. When, in the 19th century, Japanese artists added a scientific realism to their evocative paintings, some Chinese artists were quick to study with them, and re-introduced a florid and adventurous spirit to their own native traditions. Thus, between the two world wars, the Lingnan school and its many branches developed in the southern centre of Canton.

Though Au's paintings deal with a remarkable range of subjects—wild landscapes, vivid flowers, animals of all sorts, even pigs and tigers—he says he chooses these themes simply as vehicles to convey the moods of the artist. An orchid gives him an opportunity to portray high spirits with his brushwork. The calligraphy which underpins a painting of bamboo is infused with the spirit of a gentleman.

Unlike painters of more traditional styles, Lingnan painters freely mix every available method. According to gallery curator Barry Till, Au's "masterly skill in the use of the traditional principles of 'broken ink' and 'dry brush' harmonize with the techniques of water and pigment infusion." Orthodox painters sneer at this eclecticism. "They claim that colours are cheap and seductive and ink alone is highbrow, scholarly or lofty," says Au. "I think this is wrong, and feel sorry for those who have so limited their own artistic potential .... We (of the Lingnan school) are not afraid to use anything."

Even those unfamiliar with the discrete calm of traditional Chinese painting will be pleasantly surprised by Au's vast landscapes of the Grand Canyon of Arizona, and the Colosseum of Rome, included in this exhibition. Though not on show, Au's painting of Mt. Rushmore must surely have raised a few eyebrows back in Taiwan.

Solidly based in the calligraphic traditions, Au's paintings constantly strive to add a vivaciously fresh in accord with Ezra Pound's dictum, "make it new." Au also revealed that he admires Rembrandt for his richly toned shadows, and the energetic line of Matisse. When asked what advice he would give young artists, he suggested that a painter should steep himself in literature and philosophy, and that it is good for an artist to write poetry. "Know more about the universe," is how he put it. In this exhibition, there is plenty of inspiration for artists of any school.

"Plum": a vivacious freedom beyond the limitations of scholarly technique
"The material culture of the north coast groups was at once attractive in nature and abundant in quantity. Nearly everything of ethnological interest on the coast, from large sculpture to small charms, from finely crafted masks to fishhooks and arrows, was ornamented in some way. This feature made Northwest Coast material showy and desirable."

The crews of the European ships of discovery were the first to gather "artificial curiosities" from the Indians of the Pacific Northwest. Collecting in a wholesale manner developed with the birth of ethnology and the scramble to fill the American museums in the 1880's. The poles, blankets and masks were later subjected to a complete reassessment of taste and are now everywhere treasured as "art".

Douglas Cole, the author of Captured Heritage, assumes in his readers some knowledge of the natives of the Northwest. He shines a light in passing on "post-contact" history in the area, in which Europeans debase native culture with a cash economy, missionaries and disease. His main theme is how, through theft and hard bargaining, traders and scientists strip-mined some of the last and most spectacular of the primitives of their prized possessions. Cole is an historian, and makes no judgments on the rapacity, but one waits in vain for an adequate justification of the greed of the collectors.

It is a sad story, but an irresistible one for anyone who has ever wondered where the museums got all those artifacts. When I was a lad I went to the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto where, between the suits of armour and the mummies, a totem pole stood in the stair well. Honestly, I thought totems were meant to have stairs spiralling around them. Cole tells the true story of the collecting of that and many other poles.

He brings to life the collectors and their labours to fill the museums. Franz Boas, the seminal figure in American ethnology, was a dashing Prussian whose face was disfigured with duelling scars acquired at the University of Heidelberg. Among the carloads of goods he sent back from British Columbia to the American Museum of New York, and the Smithsonian in Washington were three hundred skulls with skeletons attached. These now belong to Chicago's Field Museum.

Lewis Shotridge was a Tlingit who first came south as part of the human display at the Lewis and Clark Centennial Exposition in Portland, Oregon in 1904. Later he became the man on the spot among the Tlingit, enriching the museum of the University of Pennsylvania with his clan's treasures. Shotridge confessed "the modernized part of me rejoiced over my success in obtaining this important ethnographic specimen for the museum, but, as one who had been trained to be a true Kaguanton, in my heart I cannot help but have the feeling of a traitor who has betrayed a confidence."

Marius Barbeau, the best known Canadian ethnologist, collected for and advised Canada's National Museum in Ottawa. From 1925 he was responsible for a revolutionary program of preserving totem poles. But only the ones visible to tourists on the Canadian National Railway line were conserved, "re-erected in rather unimaginative straight lines and were so brightly painted that W.A. Newcombe lamented that they were hardly recognizable", says Cole.
At the time, one native asked why "they sold whiskey in the Government liquor stores and put Indians in jail when they drank it. A few years ago they prohibited the erection of totem poles; why do they now wish to preserve them?". Cole presents their reasons, in their own words. But they are not convincing.

The longest treatment is given to the most famous collectors - Swan, Emmons, Newcombe and Boas. Yet current events continue the same themes. In 1976 "an American commercial gallery's attempt to remove the Whale House treasures (from Klukwan) resulted in a roadblock, the demolition of the offending truck, and the hospitalization of two residents" reports Cole.

In general, things were fairly purchased according to the rules of commerce. And considering the degradations that the natives suffered, the objects are better preserved in museums. There, indeed, they have served as stimulus to a new generation of artists and artworks. Yet one can't help regret the sacrifice of the old religion on the altars of commerce, science and art.

The book is well written, abundant with footnotes and sprinkled with well-chosen illustrations. Anyone with an interest in the art of the north west coast will return to the museums with a new comprehension of the provenance of the objects. Cole's book blows the mists away from a subject which is sadly but truly fascinating.

ail exhibit tracks down the second-to-last spike

VICTORIA, British Columbia

THIS YEAR marks the centennial of the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway across Canada. To commemorate the event, the British Columbia Provincial Museum is presenting a major exhibit entitled The New Highway to the Orient: The Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia 1885-1985.

A two-metre model of the Royal Hudson locomotive and a 3.3-metre model of the transpacific liner Empress of Asia are just two of the features of this surprisingly varied exhibit which recaptures the sights — and sounds — of the CPR. Surviving artifacts and the Chinese contribution are each the subject of special displays while along the walls are the period posters and brochures which lured tourists to travel by train. More than just a railway, the Canadian Pacific began as a transportation link to the Orient for the mail and commerce of the British Empire.

Branch lines, interior lakes steamers, and even airliners are part of the story. China table settings from club cars and steamships, furniture and fashions of the period give a touch of elegance and add relevance for the visitor to the exhibit. Of particular interest are a number of paintings by Canadian artists sponsored by the CPR in its early years which depict the splendors of British Columbia.

Out in front of Victoria’s heritage museum stands British Columbia’s oldest steam locomotive, nicknamed “Old Curly.” Built in 1869 in the United States, it was brought to British Columbia by Andrew Onderdonk, construction contractor for the CPR. The 3-ton saddletank locomotive is on loan from Burnaby Heritage Village.

Since the opening of the exhibition another highly symbolic artifact has been added. It is a railway spike driven at Craigellachie, near Revelstoke, to complete the trans-Canada line.

This “last” spike, like millions of others used in the construction, was made of iron. When Donald A. Smith, later Baron Strathcona and Mount Royal, attempted to drive the symbolic spike, he bested it with the first blows of his sledge hammer. Although a few spikes have been said to be the “last” spike, it is impossible to prove if any is the actual one driven on Nov. 7, 1885.

Fortunately, the best spike, the second-to-last spike, was given to Donald A. Smith and has remained with the family ever since. It is this spike that is displayed, through the courtesy of the present Lord Strathcona, great-grandson of Donald A. Smith.

The spike has some small pieces cut out of it. Lord Strathcona had jeweled pins made from these pieces for presentation to dignitaries and their wives.

The New Highway to the Orient will be open to the public until the end of 1985.

Charcoal in G: Whether it’s the fresh treatment of an old standard theme, or the long floating solo line, there’s a natural affinity between art and jazz. Canada Arts Gallery (1732 Douglas St, 384-2042) will open their new show, Jazz—Visual Improvisation with plenty of both on September 29.

Monday cartoonist Kevin Ade; Lars Belmonte, who did the baseball mural at Little Sammy’s Fattburger; and Margaret Milligan, portraitist at the Harbour Public Market, are presenting their hottest licks, as are a dozen others from here and elsewhere.

Live music with the Big Band Trio is featured opening night, and the show continues until October 6 only. (R.A.)

STEPHEN LOWE TOUR, China

REPORTS ARE beginning to come in from the Stephen Lowe Tour of four cities of China. One observer has called it "a triumph, momentous."

Before the opening in Beijing (Peking) a press conference was held within the walls of the Forbidden City. This was only the second press conference ever held by the Peking Artists Academy, and 28 media representatives attended. National coverage on Chinese television's news hour and on radio resulted.

Because the invitation went out under the calligraphy and signature of Wu Zuoren, President of the Peking Artists Academy, and the senior artist in the country, the opening of the show was like a command performance. Fifteen hundred people attended this event and, though it was held at 10 am, it was the largest ever held by the academy.

Among the guests were the Chinese Foreign Minister for Culture; the Mayor and Deputy Mayor of Beijing; the daughter of Deng Xiao Ping, China's premier; Mrs. Gorham, wife of the Canadian Ambassador; and Madame Lau She (who is a film producer and the widow of China's most famous novelist). The exhibition was hosted by Mrs. Eunice Lowe, widow of Stephen Lowe, the Canadian artist. The Chinese sponsors were Professor Wu Zuoren, President of the Peking Artists Academy; Professor Hua Ju Wu, Vice President of the academy; and Madame Hsu Bei-Hung, widow of a revered Chinese artist.

David Lowe, son of Stephen Lowe, was in attendance and reported that the large exhibit hall has been thronged continually. "Of greatest interest," he noted, "is that the old artists are coming, couples who can hardly totter along, showing by their funny smiles that they haven't been out to this sort of event in a long time." Mrs. Lowe can usually be found very slowly turning the pages of the full colour book, The Art of Stephen Lowe, surrounded by 40 or 50 onlookers.

Because photography is not permitted, artists are always there sketching the paintings and studying them one by one. A number of paintings "in the style of" Stephen Lowe have been presented to Mrs. Lowe as a mark of respect.

The second stop on the tour, Nanjing, saw audiences possibly even more eager. Some people have returned every day despite the admission fee and the fact that the major exhibition hall is up three long flights of stairs.

Visitors are keenly aware of Lowe's paintings, "amazed at the blend of their traditional style and the lush western influences," says David Lowe. "The expressions on their faces are priceless," he says, recalling in particular one old gentleman who stood on tip toe, leaning over the protective cord, to study the works with a magnifying glass.

"We did not anticipate what is happening with this show in China," says Ellenor Neumann, who attended the Beijing showing. Though the exhibition was produced entirely by the Lowe family in Canada it has been eagerly taken up by the Chinese, who are assisting the tour with high honour and utmost generosity.

The showing in Shanghai concluded early in January and will be seen in Guangzhou, its final stop, until the end of January. Mrs. Lowe will then return to her home, Victoria, with the paintings she borrowed from local collections for the exhibition.

This grand slam seems flat

BANK ART, Royal Bank Building, Government Street, between Fort and View, until June 16, 11 am—5 pm

A LARGE cross-section of Victoria artists was invited to show work in the second annual artist-run Bank Art show. And this year, for the first time, the entries were juried. Most of the big names of Victoria's art elite stayed home; also absent were the realists, the sketch clubs and the Federation of Canadian Artists members. That still left over 120 artists to represent the current concerns of our colonial culture.

The artists, led by a driving body of four (John Russell, Phyllis Serota, Luis Ituarte, and Betty Warnock) once again turned the former Royal Bank, a vast and musty hall of commerce, into an art gallery. The effect of all this art in one room is a bit like listening to 120 radios each tuned to a different station.

With the notable exception of paintings by Helen Rogak, Betty Warnock and Doris Hryciuk, virtually no landscapes were included. The jurors hung paintings which were predominantly figurative or abstract. The hard-edge abstractionists—Allen Patten, Bill Porteous, and Joseph Kyle—made a particularly fine showing with large works from an area of art history generally thought to be passé. Thus the Victoria College of Art makes its contribution to the local scene.

More painterly abstractions, rarely offered in local galleries, were among the strongest work in the show. In particular, Helene Parr, Sydney Condrashoff and B. Szekely made bold statements, perhaps attributable to Don Harvey's teaching at UVic. And the controlled chaos of abstract expressionism is alive and kicking, as exemplified by John Brigdale's Untitled enormity, and the hugely vile Cocaine by the irrepressible Jerome Zachary. Will Julsing's offering of flayed meat and the elegant piece by J.P. Costaz show abstraction just beyond realistic figurative painting, still conveying the tensions of romanticism.

Artists who paint dreams in a realist fashion might be called surrealists. Outstanding among our local breed is Martin Honisch, recently seen at the UVic library gallery. He paints like a master and devises a gentle, potent and slightly exotic imagery—he's magic! Yumie Kono Day makes smooth, simple pencil drawings which are silent and mysterious and would be very pleasant to live with. And Wendy Skog, though she attempts very clear realism, produces oddly naive work, without shadows or motion. Her Conversation marks a new height of elegance in her work, articulating a lovely confident space between women.

Installations, a sort of slide show approach to art where the artist sets up constructions or scenarios to make their points, were the most vital part of last year's October Show in Vancouver—a similar survey of artist-chosen works in that city. But this Victoria show is curiously flat, featuring decorative "wall art" in the main. Waine Ryzak is a fine local exponent of installation art but, on display without their larger context, her enigmatic glass objects seemed a bit naked. Last year's surprise hit, the Spectral Visions boys, didn't participate—they're busy in their Beacon Hill headquarters this summer.

There was sculpture on show—Jack Kidder's very dated Spaceman, Eliza Mayhew's weighty and silent Prisoners and a Bob di Castro carving mounted so high as to be unapproachable. Where were Nick Brdar and the UVic sculpture department?

Of the very few ceramic works exhibited, notable were Sue Hopper's remarkably delicate porcelains, Walter Dexter's coarse and scribbly wares, and Sandra Merino's robust, handbuilt vases, full of gorgeous flowers.
Remember CUSTOM car shows? You entered a motorized wonderland of auto-erotic fantasies, cars flung open for all to see. Handbuilt automobiles on turntables surrounded by mirrors dripped angel hair from chrome tail pipes. Guys and girls in matching club jackets gazed at chopped and channelled '49 Mercs with 40 coats of candy-apple lacquer and upholstered engine compartments. The World of Wheels, like the "Detroit iron" on which it is based, came again and vestiges of the burger cruising ethic were once more on display at the Memorial Arena last weekend.

As local show chairman, Al Clark selected the 56 cars which filled the arena. He is youthful and soft-spoken behind his big moustache, and brings years of experience to the job. "In 1956 I answered an ad in the newspaper. A couple of guys wanted to get an organized dragstrip for Victoria. Over 100 people turned up for the meeting." The Quarter Millers car club was formed then and there. Their first car show was a fundraising event at the curling rink in 1958, and Clark was the show chairman. The Quarter Millers never did get their dragstrip but when they disbanded in 1972 they left a long legacy of custom car shows in Victoria.

The International Show Car Association (ISCA) has promoted the Victoria show since 1974, with Clark as the local chairman. Two hundred events a year are staged by this group, across the continent. For their part, the ISCA puts up the prize money, brings in a feature car (this year it was the Knight Rider car of TV fame), pays travel expenses to out-of-town entrants and administers the season's competition towards the Grand Finale, this year in New Orleans. The organization is the backbone of the World of Wheels, but local restylers and car clubs are its meat and potatoes.

Victoria's Classic Chevy Club, Corvette Club, Early Ford V-8's, Vancouver Island Street Rods, Oval Track Racers and the Straight Liners (a drag racing group) got together at the World of Wheels to display the objects of their obsession. It was an opportunity to show some club spirit and attract new members too. Motorcycle gangs are not encouraged, and the van contingent is kept to a minimum. "Vans are all pretty much the same," admits Clark, "and they block the view."

Once again the echoing arena was redolent with hotdogs and hubsterism. Concessionaires sold engraved licence plate frames and spare parts for Mustangs. The bleachers were empty but the rink itself was crammed with gleaming metal and lights, row upon row of show cars, racers and wild street machines.

This year John Clapp of Sooke is showing his '56 Ford, one of the few "full customs" in the area. This car is a labour of love, and three years of creative body work lurk beneath the flame paint job of the heavy cruiser. Clapp, an autobody man by trade, formed his dreamboat entirely of metal. "People always tap it to see if it's fibreglass," he commented. "But it's built to last. And it sure gets the looks. I drive it the best way we can expect is another round of the '50s revival. It's no coincidence that Duke and the Ducktails were booked to play at the World of Wheels.

Built for speed rather than fashion, racing cars have continued to evolve. Out of Vancouver, Murray Chambers' "Black Gold" is the latest in handbuilt competition stock cars, almost unrecognizable as the '78 Plymouth Arrow it claims to be. In fact, only a gutted Plymouth body remains, snapped onto this pack of mechanical dynamite. Also on display are antique restorations, but these don't take top prizes at a custom show — they just don't have the unique and original designs of a show car. Some, like the 1938 Auburn boat-tailed speedster, are fibreglass replicas built from parts and kits, rather like 1:1 scale models.

As the years go by there are fewer and fewer real show cars. "The guys just aren't building them," Clark acknowledges. He himself gave up drag racing 10 years ago, having shut down everyone on Vancouver Island. His B-gas dragster did 160 mph in 8.5 seconds for the quarter mile. But this year conspicuous consumption just ain't what it used to be.

Yet the World of Wheels rolls on. What makes the contestants travel the distances and pay the entry fees to let the public gawk? Hardly the $30 best-in-class prize. Nor the added attractions of all seven CKDA calendar girls, continuous screenings of Stroker Ace, and Tim Reid of television's WKRP in Cincinnati. "Self-satisfaction is the reason," says Clark. "The guys have been working on their cars, some of them for years, and this is their chance." If that's what they like, well, more power to them.
1982, has made waves at X-Changes (851 North Park) for the past year. Now she has received a complete scholarship for the winter term at the Banff School of Fine Arts. This young painter is reaching for the stars.

The Federation of Canadian Artists, Vancouver Island Chapter, has installed their juried show at the Leafhill Gallery (47 Bastion Square). Curious to note, the jurors hung their own work, too. And pretty tame stuff it is. Carl Coger's portrait of a lady in a sari stands head and shoulders above the rest. Coger is the best portraitist in town, bar none.

Jack Wise was here recently with his new woodblock print. It was produced to his design by Atelier Sadao of Vancouver in the best Japanese technique. Rich, deep colours are set into dampened handmade paper producing a product much more sophisticated than the usual four-colour offset or screenprint.

Among the recent works in the Artists at City Hall project, there is a painting causing some stir in the aldermen's lounge. Eliza Hawkins made the huge oil, showing three stallions rampant over a reclining nude. And the title? "The Death of Sophie Pemberton". Sophie Pemberton was raised in Rockland and became B.C.'s first professionally-trained artist. Her biography didn't mention three horses.

Robert Genn does a very graphic update on the Group of Seven at the Marshall Gallery (1636 Cedar Hill X Road). Remember, the Group were largely commercial artists applying their skills to the landscape. Genn is, too. He employs all their tricks—flat patterning, unpeopled nature, oil sketches on panel with a bit of wood showing through—and adds his own bold colour schemes. It's a formula for success and this Victoria native, now a resident in White Rock, has success aplenty. Also, a large selection of his screenprints are on show and he, more than most, knows how to design for the print medium. Good show.

UVic's Maltwood Museum has added two collections to its holdings of decorative arts. Van Dam's Antique Shop (Fort and Quadra) supplied 24 pieces of antique Wedgewood, mostly creamware. And Besse Fitzgerald, founder of The Quest for Handcrafts, sold the museum The A.H. and E. Collection of Good Design. The group of more than 124 items documents a local "cottage industry" in handcrafts. Included are Wayne Ngan pots, native masks, and a dining room suite made by a company.

Robert Cotton started during his school days. It's good to see an art gallery take some interest in the local talent.

Sandy Clark's show at Canada Arts (across from the Bay on Douglas) is well worth a look. It is obvious at a glance that Clark is a professional artist and can accomplish whatever she puts her brush to. The watercolours are handled with ease, some of the portraits are memorable, but her large marine oils have the atmosphere and solidity to win over people who don't normally like art. Watch this gallery for more good shows.

Rough stones become polished crystal. This writer called the work of Lance Olsen "badass" and David Toresdahl "too weird" when they showed at Stones Gallery. And two weeks later they're moving a new show into the Crystal Gardens Gallery. Somebody's image is going to have to change...

When the Ninstints film by Vicky Husband and Karl Spreitz made its debut at the Newcombe Auditorium, hundreds were turned away at the door, though there were 600 already inside. Local talent can command an audience! Bravo. Now, when can the rest of us see this film?

He was uneasy and restless in the houses of Europeans, never natural, anxious not to draw their ready violence, verbal or physical, so that he became almost obsequious with them, and when they spoke of China he fell silent. Like many of his generation, he always had the feeling that they tried to pry into him, to "open a hole into his soul," because of their avidity for "understanding the Oriental," which he considered an insolence."

Han Suyin, China: Autobiography, History

"If the "mysterious east" was not such a mystery, our Canadian community would be richer. Ignoring Chinese origins and intentio... has yielded exploitation, racism and paternalism.

Two new books about the Chinese in Canada dismantle the absurd notion of the yellow peril and free us from the myths, the secrets of Chinatown, and the "campaign giveaways." The effect is chastening for white liberals, inspiring for Canadians of Chinese parents, and makes utterly stimulating reading for anyone with a curiosity about our history.

Anthony Chan is the author of Gold Mountain. Born in Victoria, he is the grandson of Chan Dun, who came to Victoria in 1887. Chan Dun was a pillar of the community, owning many businesses including the Panama Cafe (now Edna Brown's Little Dinner Theatre) on Government Street. "In 1917 he translated his republican leanings into support for the Guomintang by setting up aviation schools in the Willows Beach area in Victoria and Esquimalt to train Sun Yat-Sen's revolutionary pilots," says Chan. History, from the Chinese point of view, is full of revelation. Chan is an ethnologist, and writes with commitment and conviction, "a loving and angry look at his own community."

Of course he gives new information about the legends of Chinatown: "Gambling parlours owned and operated by Chinese merchants were open night and day to bachelor workers with time to kill after a shift cleaning house in a white minister's home... the first organized betting activity started in Victoria's Fantan Alley, famous in the Chinese communities throughout North America as 'Bank Street.' At its peak, after the completion of the CPR in 1884, Fantan Alley had 12 houses of chance as well as several restaurants catering to hungry gamblers."

But, more important, he lets us in on Chinese-Canadian life during the recent periods, for example the era of the Exclusion Act which was endured from 1923 until 1947. In some communities Dominion Day was called Humiliation Day -- a day to bachelor... with special attention to the recent years.

From China to Canada, edited by Edgar Wickberg, is a much longer and more scholarly book. Yet, while it gives more data and footnotes, it lacks the conviction and personality behind every page of Chan's book. From China to Canada is a history of the communities, their organizations and associations. The Chinese are demographically traced throughout Canada, with special attention to the recent years. And for the reader who will stick with it, there is a lot to learn. "In the period before 1947, a large number of organizations reflected the social needs of a partly isolated "bachelor" phase. In the period since, the much more numerous... organizations that have appeared reflect the great diversity... now present. Despite this extensive organizational apparatus, however, the Chinese "organizational genius" has never produced in Canada a single body that could unite all Chinese Canadians."

Here is a good education for a future in which the East will increasingly meet the West in Canada. These two books completely supercede James Morton's In the Sea of Sterile Mountains, which Chan rightly calls "paternalistic and racist in tone." And they provide the local context for reading Woman Warrior and China Man by Maxine Hong Kingston, extraordinary stories of the Chinese in America. Gold Mountain is very readable; From China to Canada provides a wealth of information. These are two books which could save us from repeating the errors of the past.

On the first run of CN's super-fast Turbo train some years ago, the locomotive, going full speed, ran into a meat truck at a level crossing. Hamburger all over the highway! Now that's action. We're always looking for maximum thrills... Mt. St. Helen's, genocide and war are on the news every hour on the hour. Rarely does art even approximate the demolition derby of life.

In New York, current enfant terrible of the art world Julian Schnauble can make paintings so big and so nasty (hung babies in oil paint on steer hide with antlers) that the world screams to a halt in front of them. In Toronto, Mark Prent dwells on themes so awful (rotting corpses with files) that they send for the police. Now, in Victoria, Lance Olsen makes paintings so bad you can hardly focus your eyes, and you'd better not say "that's nice" or "I like it."

Not that Olsen isn't a superb paint technician and a good colourist. His drawings are cartoons, but he paints with great skill. He makes huge canvasses and lays it on thick. But he's a badass painter, full of scorn and disgust for a world gone crazy (and it has gone crazy, hasn't it?). He looks life in the eye and finds us engaged in terminal delusion. Picasso painted Guernica from a similar point of view. Olsen presents the new Dance of Death which he titles "go-go dancing in the morgue." He paints the local burghers as "Art Gallery (sycophants)." Fear and loathing act as extraordinary stimuli. Olsen paints from his heart, his vision untempered with market appeal. The results are so overstimulating as to render this critic numb.

I wouldn't want to own one but I can't forget the full tilt shock. These paintings make the rest of Victoria's art world look like a bunch of pansies.

And what about Toresdahl's ceramic items? Craftsmanship so good as to be invisible, subjects too weird to contemplate. Bludgeons and burnt-out tailpipes—too weird. Better say nothing.

So, thrill seekers, hurry on down. There's a kick, like bad drugs, William Bur-
Gaining Speed fast on a step-over turn, around the far end and into a pack of people who melt out of the way like Mexican traffic. One foot forward, one foot back, into the splits, carving up the next turn on the hum of rubber wheels; past the strobe lights, the DJ, the column speakers and off into the dim echoing vastness of the Oak Bay Curling Rink. The ice is out, the Skatorium is open again for a new season.

By opening time the line-up stretched way out of sight, kids buzzing with after dinner energy and waiting to lay down 75c ($1.60 adults) to join the fray. Through the glass they could see the whole teenage cosmos orbiting on well-oiled wheels. Guys with beer shirts and first moustaches. Girls with nail polish and stretch jeans. “Hey, how’d you get your skin so clear?” “See that chick in blue—she’s a real floozy!” ”Donny Osmond? I hope nobody saw you. How gross!”

On the floor everyone is socializing at speed, dodging and dipping and never tripping. The music becomes cacophony in the echo and shrieks of the adolescent melee. Hunky guys, “couples-only” numbers, little brothers, chips and a pop machine—it’s all here.

The activity is healthy, cheap, and overwhelmingly popular—there must have been 300 rollerskaters there. And the same is true of all the activities at the Oak Bay Rec Centre (385-SWIM). The joint is jumping, a three-ring circus for the “me” generation. Do it in the water, do it on the ice, or roll around with the teenagers. At the Skatorium there are skate rentals (60¢), roller skating lessons, exercises on wheels and age-group sessions.

In other parts of the region, the Juan de Fuca Rec Centre (478-8384) starts rolling April 12, the Panorama Leisure Centre (656-7271) on May 1, and possibly the G.H. Pearkes Arena as well (388-6664), though they haven’t yet decided whether or not to offer roller skating. Tie on some skates, and launch yourself into the swarm. No experience necessary.

IN ONE E A R...
I've always had a bit of a chip on my shoulder about the Stephen Lowe Gallery. Stephen Lowe arrived from Kwang Tung and Hong Kong and painted in Victoria from 1956 until his untimely death in 1976. His many students and admirers in Victoria held him in reverence and his wife has kept his memory bright at the Stephen Lowe Gallery. Perhaps its unqualified success was what brought out my antagonism.

Stephen Lowe painted in the style of the Lingham School. That is a Hong Kong style of painting mixing florid colours, virtuoso brushwork, and sentimental subject matter into an almost irresistible potpouri. These paintings show little of the quiet reserve of the venerable and ancient works of Chinese painting now on show at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria. Those older works are filled with a quiet profundity noticeable only to the connoisseur. On the contrary, Lowe's paintings are instantly accessible— to tourists and shoppers and interior decorators, to all sorts of people. Perhaps that's why I haven't allowed myself unqualified admiration.

Though Lowe's misty mountain views gained my admiration right away, some of his subjects seemed a bit much—a one metre high eagle coming down like a B-52; an almost life size albino tiger; a white peacock in a flowering plum tree.

Yet these are strange reasons for dismissing an artist—he's loved by students and admirers, the public at all levels appreciate his work, and the subjects are sensational. In fact, I've gone back again and again. There are attractive features in this work which are unequalled in Victoria's art history. I've come to admire Lowe's work.

In the first place, some of these ink and colour paintings on paper are huge. The azalea bush on show is fully two metres across, an extensive area to fill with banks of delicate, brush-drawn blossom.

Secondly, Lowe's paintings show a novel and sophisticated use of colour beyond the shades of ink. He sometimes soaked the paper with a transparent ground of unexpected hue—orange sky, green sky, pink sky. On top are glowing wet-on-wet flowers, their brightest points picked out in brilliant jabs of opaque colour. This is an unrivalled range of technique.

Finally, there is Lowe's calligraphic brush drawing. Bamboo, branch stems, and trailing vines are traditional motifs which Lowe excelled at. His technique is

VICTORIA — The Art Gallery of Greater Victoria has been astound
in cultivating its collection of Asian Art. Beginning in 1901, trea sures from the East poured into this gallery. Old colonials who had settled on Vancouver Island brought carvings which left Tibet with the Youngusband Expedition, and art taken from China during the Second Opium War and the Boxer Rebellion. Paintings, pots and costumes were brought in the baggage of missionaries and busi nessmen and all have found their way into the museum. For years, the extensive Fred and Isabel Pol lard Collection of Japanese Art has been built up at the gallery, and continues to grow. All of this at tracts more gifts, scholars of re nown and, increasingly, the public.

The ferry trip to Victoria is not everyone’s cup of tea, but curator Barry Till has repeatedly made it worthwhile. Last year, Till glo tered what he considered “all the good Chinese paintings in Canada” for a show in Victoria, borrowing from the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, Toronto’s Royal Ontario Mu seum (where he had worked previ ously), Ottawa’s National Ga
lery and the few good private col lections in this country.

For that show, Till was able to borrow the oldest paintings in Canada for their first public view ing. Painted in about 700, these had been sealed in China’s celebrated Dun Huang Caves on the Silk Road for 800 years until they were brought to Sir Aurel Stein early in this century. The paintings later came to Canada with the mission ary James Menzies and were lent to the Victoria exhibit by his son, Arthur, a former ambassador to China. Arthur Menzies has since donated these and other works to the Victoria Gallery.

This year Till has produced exhi bitions devoted to Chinese, Chi nese porcelain of the high Qing period and Japanese ceramics, to name but a few. But the big event is Japanese Paintings in Canada:
Collections, on show until Feb. 12.
There are almost 150 paintings, including the huge thirteenth-cen tury Amida Buddha in the Western Paradise on loan from ROM, and Victoria’s own A-ji-ken, a work from the fourteenth century which Till says is one of the best Japanese paintings in North America. It is a meditational painting of the San skrit letter “A,” exquisitely done in soft colors and cut gold. If it were in Japan, it would be considered a national treasure.

Ink paintings in scroll format predominate. These are not the austere and mysterious Chinese landscapes, but something more dazzling. “Ink painting started with the Chinese,” Till explains, “but I think the Japanese took it to a higher level.”

But didn’t the Chinese reach the pinnacle of ink painting? “They had it for a while in the Sung period, but then you look at some of these work (ink) pieces by the Japanese, and they’re fantastic. I think in some ways, by the Muromachi period (c.
1400), the Japanese had surpassed the Chinese. Muromachi is a period in which the Japanese devoted their art almost exclusively to ink paint ing.”

And how about those Japanese screens teeming with life and color on gold leaf backgrounds? “The Chinese never had anything as beautiful as that. Apparently, in big palaces and villas, gold panels and screens would reflect the light, and brighten up the dark halls. You could silhouette a tree or a figure on this glowing background; it was totally a Japanese innovation and the screens are magnificent.”

Best represented in the Victoria collection of Japanese paintings is the style called yamato-e, work of the eighteenth- and nineteenth-century Japanese who were the most important to the Japanese style.”

In the show, Till has selected a work by the famous artist Hasegawa Chikugyo. One of the most prized paintings in the collection is Hawk

MAJOR JAPANESE PAINTINGS IN CANADIAN COLLECTIONS
Art Gallery of Greater Victoria
1040 Moss St., 384-4101
Dec. 9-Feb. 12, 1984

The Art Gallery of Greater Victoria has been assiduous in cultivating its collection of Asian Art. Beginning in 1951, treasures from the East poured in to this gallery. Old colonials who had settled on the bally shores of southern Vancouver Island wrought carvings which left Tibet with the Thonghushand Expedition, and art taken from China during the second Opium War and the Boxer Rebellion. Paintings and pots and costumes were brought back in the luggage of missionaries or businessmen and have all eventually found their way into the storerooms. For years the extensive Fred and Isabel Pollard Collection of Japanese Art has been built up at the gallery and continues to grow. All this has formed a centre of gravity which attracts more gifts, scholars of renown, and increasingly, the public.

An afternoon in Rockland is not everyone’s cup of tea, but gallery curator Barry Till has repeatedly made it worthwhile. Last year Till gathered up what he considered “all the good Chinese paintings in Canada” for a show in Victoria, borrowing from the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts, Toronto’s Royal Ontario Museum (where he worked previously), Ottawa’s National Gallery and the few good private collections in this country. Scholars from around the world took notice.

For that show, Till was able to borrow the oldest paintings in Canada for their first public viewing. Painted in about 670 A.D., these had been sealed in China’s celebrated Dun Huang Caves on the Silk Road for 800 years until they were brought to Sir Aurel Stein early in this century. The paintings were later brought to Canada by the missionary James Menzies and loaned to the Victoria exhibit by his son, Arthur, a former Ambassador to China. Arthur Menzies has since donated these and other works to the gallery in Victoria.

This year Till has produced exhibitions devoted to cloisonné, Chinese porcelain of the High Qing period and Japanese ceramics, to name just a few. But the big event is Major Japanese Paintings in Canadian Collections, on show only in Victoria, from December 9 until February 12, 1984. Almost 100 paintings will delight the viewer, including the huge 13th century Amita Buddha in the Western Paradise on loan from the Royal Ontario Museum, and Victoria’s own A-ji-ban, a work from the 14th century which Till says is one of the best Japanese paintings in North America. It is a meditational painting of the Sanskrit letter “A,” exquisitely done in soft colours and cut gold. If it was in Japan it would be considered a national treasure.

Ink paintings in scroll format predominate, traces of a supple pointed brush that can ripple and fly, sing and whisper and shock. These are not the austere and mysterious Chinese landscapes, but something much more dazzling. “Ink painting started with the Chinese,” Till explains, “but I think the Japanese took it to a higher level.” Didn’t the Chinese reach the very pinnacle of ink painting? “They had it for a while in the Sung period, but then you look at some of these sumi (ink) pieces by the Japanese, and they’re fantastic. You could silhouette a tree or a figure on this glowing background. It was totally a Japanese innovation and the screens are magnificent," says Till.

Best represented in Victoria's collection of Japanese paintings is the style called nanga, work of the 18th and 19th century Japanese who were aficionados of the Chinese taste. "The Japanese have borrowed things from the Chinese and Koreans," admits Till, "but they have a habit of changing them into something totally Japanese." The 14th century Chinese master Huang Gongwang painted in the old Chinese tradition, one of squared-off boulders painted with the understated dynamism of great but withheld energy. In the Victoria show, a work by 19th century Japanese artist, Nakabayashi Chikuto, is inscribed "in the manner of Huang Gongwang." But the Japanese artist has transformed the restrained lines into scintillating brushstrokes. The quietist and contemplative tradition of the Chinese scholar has become a lyrical, emotive communication in virile and flamboyant Japan.

One of the most prized paintings in Victoria's collection is Hawk in Snow by Yamamoto Baiitsu, painted in 1846 when the artist was 63 years old. A hawk in search perches on a snow-laden branch, ready for instant flight. The stark diagonal of the branch is traced with a wet brush, punctuated by energetic daubs like ink explosions. Dwarf bamboo hangs out from the cliff face, cold and still and charged with spatial tension. The background of the scroll, bathed in light ink, creates the effect of a snow-grey sky, the snow itself cleverly reserved on the blank white silk. Paintings like this are a joy for the casual viewer as well as the scholar.

Two paintings are on loan from Banff's Peter Whyte Gallery. These came to Banff years ago, brought by Peter Whyte's wife from Boston, an important port in the clipper trade with Japan. They were part of a flood of material which arrived shortly after Japan was opened to the West. Also included in the show are treasures from the Finlayson Collection. The Finlaysons donated their very choice group of Chinese paintings to the National Gallery of Canada in the 1960s and Victoria has been chosen as the repository for their Japanese scrolls. Theirs is a collection of particularly high quality.

Now that Till has surveyed the nation's resources, his biggest problem is to hang the work in a way that's not too crowded. Japanese aesthetics might allow only one picture oom, but that's not practical. Given the chance to see such a wealth of beauty, viewers will certainly forgive the gallery staff for hanging it all rather close together. Part of the approach will be to place fathers and sons, teachers and pupils side by side.

Two years ago Britain's prestigious Apollo Magazine published two articles about the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria's oriental collections, giving just a hint of the riches. The Japanese collection was said to be "the most important in Canada." Since that time gifts and scholarships have continued to arrive. The addition of precious loans from other galleries makes this exhibition of major Japanese paintings a wonder to behold.

Original oil paintings by famous Canadian artists are not going for a song any more, but the Canadian block print is a field in which discoveries are yet to be made.

The term “block print” encompasses prints on paper from hand-carved wooden blocks, linoleum blocks, and wood engravings. After World War I, photoengraving had made hand-cut blocks obsolete from a commercial point of view. But obsolescence released the form to artists who adapted it as a serious means of expression.

In Canada, between 1919 and 1945, a great many artists tried their hands at this “democratic” art form to make inexpensive limited editions, greeting cards, or book illustrations. Canadian Block Prints, a fully illustrated catalogue from Calgary’s Glenbow Museum, is an eye opener to this little-known art.

The most famous practitioner of the block print is Winnipeg’s W.J. Phillips (1884-1963). Phillips created 156 colored prints — mostly Canadian scenes — and 70 wood engravings, which owe their inspiration to art nouveau, British watercolors, and the Japanese woodblock print. A few years back, his prints could be had for less than $50 at swap meets and auction sales, but with the recognition retrospective shows and catalogues have brought him, the price has increased tremendously, now ranging from $500 to $5,000.

Phillips is one of a very few Canadians who dedicated themselves to printmaking, yet most artists have produced the occasional print. The Glenbow catalogue lists 63 of these, from the well-known (A.J. Casson, LeMoine FitzGerald, Jack Shadbolt) to the more obscure (Cliff Robinson, Leonard Hutchinson, Viola Depew). Samples of their work are included, as well as biographies, expositions on technique, and an overview of Canadian art from this unique standpoint.

These prints lend themselves to perfect reproduction, and this handsome picture book contains hundreds of illustrations, many in color. Patricia Ainslie’s text is clearly written and includes much original research. For those who haunt old bookshops or the auction-hunting art collector, Canadian Block Prints is required reading.

The book accompanies an exhibition, which will be on display at the Art Gallery of Ontario in Toronto (April 13-May 19, 1985) and then travels to Winnipeg (June 8-July 21) and Victoria (Aug. 8-Sept. 15).

Watt's black and glows? Vancouver's John Clair Watt (Open Space, 510 Fort St. 383-8833 until July 18) brings an unemotional yet deeply committed sensibility to his glow-in-the-dark sculptures. Watt has blacked out Open Space and installed more than a dozen engaging constructions. A suspended slab of etched glass glows under the illumination of a tiny red laser. On the wall a shining star is caught in a chromed net of chains, craft and thought joined in poetry. "Borderline" is the name of an installation, a transparent picket fence glowing with rim-light and a vinyl seagull rising above it. Engaging, thought provoking—a good show. (R.A.)

Skywalk tulips: Eaton's downtown skywalk is once again the scene of the Stained Glass Exhibition (until August 25) and while the work is hardly adventurous this year, perhaps that's how this decorative art should be. Flowers in glass predominate. Paul Wullum's tulip is a lovely design, and well made, as are all the pieces. Imke Pearson's abstracts would complement a stylish decor—strong yet not too outspoken. The most imaginative is the work of Markian Olynyk. Not only does Olynyk solder together colours and plain glass, but sand-blasted grids are called into play to make inventive, mysterious windows. In the summer of 1982 Luis Ituarte was working on a mural on the causeway in the harbour. He titled his abstract "The Spirit of Helen Anderson." I asked him why. "Her paintings don't appeal to me, but her spirit is fantastic — she's always there, promoting and encouraging the artistic culture of Victoria," he said. And he's the sort of artist who would notice.

Up in his spectacular roof-top studio at 17½ Fan Tan Alley, there is a scrapbook which traces Ituarte's early history. He's forty years old now but it seems he was a law student in Mexico whose political fervour wouldn't let him take it easy. As an artist, a maker and doer, he had to express himself. On coming to Canada this expression took the form of highly successful landscapes reproduced by screen printing, but Luis had the good sense to let someone else print his original paper-cut designs. He was busy with more creative endeavours.

Just a glance at the output from his skylit, cactus-filled studio will give you some idea that we are dealing with a man of breadth, scope and vision. I first noticed the decor of La Hacienda Restaurant in Market Square — his design. Following this, his studio show of 1982 included work in many media, but all were executed in red, blue and green. These "tv" colours were the hallmark of this daring colour experiment, one which he made use of in the sculptures which soon followed.

Ituarte's wire sculptures, hatrack-sized, first appeared like shimmering I.U.D.'s at the third annual Erotic Art Show in Chinatown. Then a giant version of these springy steel "drawings in space" was created as the centrepiece of the original AlleyArt project, which transformed Waddington Alley (behind the Salvation Army Building between Yates and Johnson Streets) and led to the Blue Fence Painting project (Fort and Quadra) and the Causeway Paint-In, all of which were graced by the Ituarte touch.
“In Mexico you die every day when you go to sleep,” Ituarte says, “the next day when you awake, it’s a whole different thing.”

Each day is new. Each day must count. This man is a proponent of the transforming power of art on a city, a legacy which Victoria owes to his Mexican heritage. Not only has Luis provided a visual oasis for the casual passer-by, but he has sought to bring artists together to support one another and cooperate in big projects. His studio has been a meeting place and workshop for many. Norval Morrisseau made his first lino-cuts there, and Ituarte’s efforts on behalf of that singular and powerful artist were extensive.

Last October Ituarte planned a project vast in scale, involving a suite of outdoor sculptures, a gallery full of wall pieces, large installations, dances and costumes; he even covered Fan Tan Alley with a roof. Originally scheduled as a Hallowe’en party at the Crystal Gardens, the entire opus moved to Chinatown when the Crystal Garden Gallery folded in August. His huge triangular sculptures were for three weeks a striking addition to Fisgard Street, notable even to drivers going by. And the transformation of Fan Tan Alley into a playful and intriguing environment was an adventurous (though non-commercial) success. Luis used huge coloured canvases, garnished with string, tinsel and tiddlywinks to add a festive touch to a grimy urban space. At the time the success of his work seemed to stand or fall with the street party he added to the plans. But it sticks in the memory as a high point of recent urban art.

Ituarte’s work is not obscure. “I think the public really understands my work, in a tacit way. They know I’m doing something positive,” he says.

He continues to produce large and innovative projects using the entire city as a canvas. This year he created a banner which unified the Peace March. And for the Harbour Festival he created and presented a “kite tail” 1000 yards long, enough to circle the inner harbour when passed through the hands of thousands of marchers. Yet his work can be as intimate as the greeting cards he manufactures, and as discrete as the sand garden which he designed for the current window display at Fan Tan Gallery (541 Fisgard St.).

The spirit of Luis Ituarte enriches our city. He gives his visual grace notes as a gift — to the City Hall exhibits, The Bank Art Show, to streets, alleys and fences. If anyone wants to give a prize to an artist who has enriched the cultural life of Victoria, I suggest Ituarte. His wide range of activities and high public profile ensures that he offends quite a few narrow-minded types. But his work will always address itself to society.

“Society is a huge animal, an organism of many cells. Art becomes relevant only when it is part of this animal. The function of art relates to society. Without society it has no meaning.” So says this man who singlehandedly is changing the culture of our society here in Victoria.

“...I think the public really understands my work...”

JIM SWAIN, X-Changes Gallery, 981 North Park St., until April 30
MICHAEL LEWIS, Ideas—Sacred and Profane, 1310 Government St., indefinitely
HERBERT SIEBNER, Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, 1040 Moss St., 384-4101, until June 17

IN THE art gallery auction last February, there was a painting hanging in a corner, low down and out of the way, entitled “Alcohol Can Take Me There.” It was painted in a very “brute” style—childish, and without the usual niceties of technique. It showed a person at a table, drunk. There, at the gallery, amid all the pretty paintings, it was as if some paint-smeared artist had run in and yelled “yer all a bunch of well-heeled winos!” In place of a signature, in the lower right was written “WORDS.”

WORDS is the signature of artist Jim Swain, and not long ago X-Changes Gallery (981 North Park Street) was jumping with his Recent Words. In his statement, Swain explained how modern art occurred when art and beauty were separated. He speaks without the usual false sentiment of prettiness. Even so, his viewers weren’t offended by the messages of absurdity and inter-human affairs. He sold 18 paintings.

Former X-Changes members and others have opened a new gallery with the rather daunting title Ideas: Sacred and Profane (1310 Government Street). Michael Lewis’ work was on show there recently. Lewis is a totally bald young man with a ring in his ear. His oil paintings are cut up like comic books, loaded with words, characters and settings in cubist perspective. Sex, potential violence and murder movies are all mixed up with Victoria scenes—Little Sammy’s Restaurant is the centrepiece of one expressionist drama of hookers on Government between Yates and Johnson, near the location of the gallery. The debt to the German expressionism of George Grosz is obvious. Here is a startlingly different view of our town.

Unlike the received visual impressions which are the substance of impressionism, expressionism is concerned with the inner workings of man, what is felt rather than seen. “The expressionist is also an exhibitionist,” says Herbert Siebner, who is, by nature, both.

Growing up in wartime Germany and moving to straight-laced Victoria in 1953 provided him with a foil of repression from which his irrepressible spirit breaks free. Centaurs and nudes gambolling in a vacant landscape, images of lust, licence, and revelry are a big part of his very consistent oeuvre. Yet, more relevant to 1984 are his angst-ridden scenes—suicide in the canal, premature burial, or the giant head of Mussolini.

Siebner’s blue and orange colour schemes, his mix of organic texture and hard edge, and his passion for colossal shapes give a certain sameness to his work. But make no mistake—he is a giant among Victoria artists. Not for him the discrete calligraphic fields of Jack Wise or Mary Ar nold. This man's symbols—belle bella, the flying man—are, literally, made concrete in his magnificent sgraffito, incised cement paintings.

Siebner is quite candid about the anecdotal details of each work, and his own comments are vastly more illuminating than the diffuse para-psychology, "the antithesis of I and Not-I," which curator Nicholas Tuele propounds. Some stern, strong paintings are included in this show, but these are swamped by dozens of images of nudes on the beach, apparently chosen because they depict two figures—to go with the Duality theme of the show.

And though the catalogue promises to tell us how Siebner translates expressionism to Victoria, it does no such thing.

PHYLLIS SEROTA: A YEAR'S WORK
Winchester Galleries, 1545 Fort, until June 16 (595-2777)

PHYLLIS SEROTA'S show is a great favourite with the public. The comments in the visitors' book are effusive, speaking of love and thanks. And rightly so, for this artist paints love and trust, the pain of growing and the joy of being human. She does this in a way which raises the particulars of her life to a universal level. These paintings, like a deck of tarot cards, present the big symbols: mother and father, religion, dreams and death. Yet they are presented in a way which is friendly and familiar. By this means she helps us add meaning to our own lives.

People in relation to one another is her constant theme. These are not life-like portraits, but arrangements of people interacting. This year's show is a family album. One painting portrays her mother and father. Like characters out of a John Steinbeck novel, with the stalwart love of young parents, they face the future. In The Golden Dream, a young man throws his arms heavenward, caught in rapture in a hillside. Through three paintings, Aunt Molly dances in ecstasy at a bar mitzvah. The family circle claps and laughs and cheers us on. Finally, Serota has painted young and old people walking forward together, inexorably proceeding through life. This painting is entitled "We go on."

"I want to paint love and trust, youth and age," says Serota. "I feel obliged to speak not only of the joys, but also of the sorrows; how difficult and heroic our lives really are, and to celebrate that bravery."

It has been a long road which brought the artist to this apparently simple purpose. In Chicago, as a wife and mother in her 20s, she says "we painted still life—plastic fruit arranged on a cloth. I painted hundreds." Later, she studied painting at Malaspina College and at UVic. But it was an afternoon she spent with Max Bates that set her on her path: "He was so positive," she says, not at all the cynic one might expect.

Beyond the formal training, she underwent art therapy for four years. Though the thousands of paintings she made were not beautiful, she became a better painter. Moreover, she learned to "go inside herself" for the subjects, to her dreams and memories and strong inner visions.

It's not just her subjects that elicit the response, for everyone remarks on the colours, bold and sensual. Theatre lighting gave her the idea, and Serota studied colour schemes freed from "realism". She attributes her success to a subsequent year's work with the colour wheel. Thus the richly graduated purples of Aunt Molly's dress are set against a turquoise ground and her outstretched hand in front of a golden table strikes the eye like a gong.

These facts are enough to explain Serota's appeal, but there is more. Figures float in tilted, curving compositions reminiscent of Chagall. With the confidence of a consummate artist she can directly create a face or form without laboured detail. Phyllis Serota has something to say and the means to say it. That combination is rare, and very satisfying.

The gold rush is on again

When the B.C. Provincial Museum was built in 1967, the building code allowed asbestos to be bonded to structural steel as a fire retardant. In time this material breaks up, and by the mid 1970s the curatorial staff began to notice its dangerous presence in the form of a white dust building up on their desks.

These sensitive curators soon became well-read in the literature on the health hazards presented by the tiny, carcinogenic fibres. By 1976 a workers' safety committee had been formed and called a walkout to force the issue. Management then took steps to rid the curatorial tower, floor by floor, of the deadly dust.

The danger to the public has always been slight, but for the staff working behind the scenes in the exhibitions building the risk was present and cumulative. A couple of years ago the building's owner, British Columbia Building Corporation, closed the second floor natural history displays and got rid of the asbestos. This past year, the third floor has been closed since October. By night, eight men have entered an air lock into the attic, donned "space suits" and spent the hours of darkness chiselling and scraping the noxious stuff off every strut and girder, under the roof and behind the displays. Every morning, for two hours, the air in the museum was monitored before being pronounced safe for the public to breathe.

Now the project is complete, right on schedule at a cost of $1.6 million. (Just as this one is finished, the Gorge Road Hospital embarks on a $200,000 project to replace its asbestos-sprayed ceilings.)

While the third floor was closed, a sprinkler system was discreetly hidden throughout—inside Captain Vancouver's ship Discovery, among the rocks in the mine shaft, and between the planks of the Indian longhouse. A few new exhibits were added, in particular in the Gold Rush area, and a thorough cleaning was undertaken, not only of the asbestos but of the general grime. After all, the museum has had more than a million visitors every year since 1972, and in the summer 20,000 people a day file past the masks and the mammoth.

Even jaded locals are pleasantly surprised to rediscover the charm and illusion of the half-scale turn-of-the-century cobblestone street. The new collection of argillite is in a jewel-like setting and well worth prolonged study. And the renowned Legacy show, an exhibit of contemporary Northwest Coast Art in the continuing tradition, will be on display throughout the summer.

It's going to be a while before we see Jean Andre's Undersea World show there— it seems the submersible section is causing traffic problems. But the museum has no lack of visitors. You can breathe freely now. Come again, come often—it's open every day, and it's free.

Kerry Joe Kelly's back! Here's an artist who turned aside the cheap wine and old culture of Portugal to come back to the Pacific Southwest. Kelly's hair is a bit greyer, his beard and ponytail are gone, but he's the same fellow. A native of Victoria, Kelly made a solid reputation in the early 1970s with his stained-glass, most notably at Stewart's Restaurant (now Rick's Cafe) and the Department of Tourism Offices on Wharf Street.

Of course he's known for more than "window-dressing." The original artist's studio in Chinatown was his, and conceptual art, ceramics, silk screen editions and erotic drawings poured forth from it up to the time of his marriage and departure for Europe with his wife Diane.

Kelly says in Portugal the artists were well supported by "old money" before the communist revolution of 1974. But when he and Diane set up there in 1980, the glass factories which he had gone to visit were mostly in the hands of the workers. With the engineers and directors long gone, they were going out of business fast. So Kelly concentrated on printmaking and a few domestic glass commissions. And Diane showed a natural talent for operating well-attended contemporary art galleries for the four years of their stay.

Now that he's back, Kelly is at work on etched and laminated glass pieces, working out his new techniques with Seattle's Fremont Glass Co. We're glad to have him back.

Those who daily on Dallas Road have perhaps seen an artist at his easel, silhouetted on a headland against the Olympics. It's Carl Coger in that classic pose, preparing pictures for what should be a very appealing show entitled "Trees of Dallas Road."

These days cafes are a very popular venue for art and Coger's "Pastels and Pastries" have been seen at Black Forest Pastries for some time. "Trees" is an all new show at the same location, leading the viewer along
Black and white and light all-over: In the newly-lit galleries of the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria (1040 Moss St., 384-4101), viewers can still catch Mary Arnold's photograms—photographs made without a camera—until May 13.

They don't look much like photographs. Large sheets of light-sensitive paper are her canvas, and light is her paint. The papers are exposed, bit by bit, to all kinds of light—daylight, burning matches, sparklers and even a little night light. All manner of transparent films interfere to alter the light impressions—sheets of textured glass, water, cotch tape and so on. Scratches and scribbles, cut-outs and collage are called into play to create big and surprisingly luminous images in black and white. These photograms don't represent anything; they don't illustrate or mean anything. Yet, there they are, confident in scale, joyous in execution and full of invention. This is engaging modern work by one of our best young artists, art that would make the grade anywhere.

GRAVITY WINS AGAIN. by Mary Lynn Ogilvie, X-Changes Gallery, 981 North Park Street, to Mar. 11.

RECONSTITUTED ELEMENTS. Open Space, 510 Fort Street, 383-8833, until Mar. 24.

X-CHANGES IS an artists' cooperative studio located above the Canadian Linen Service on North Park Street. Small studios around the perimeter of the building enclose an L-shaped gallery in the middle. Work by the 12 X-Changes members and others is shown here, and none has been more striking, thought-provoking or more suited to the space then Mary Lynn Ogilvie's Gravity Wins Again.

The exhibition featured three of Ogilvie's paintings-become-sculpture. Each work took an elemental theme—gravity, wind, rain—and explored it in a generous and playful way. These new works were spacious, engaging and seemed to emerge naturally from the experience of life here in Victoria.

The marine artists' show was poorly hung, with paintings over windows and hot radiators, but the Maritime Museum is to be commended for going out of its way to house this first exhibition of the Canadian Society of Marine Artists (CSMA).

The paintings were entirely by west coast artists, but that will surely change with time. Modelled on England's Royal Society of Marine Artists, the CSMA is an idea whose time has come and it should develop into a national institution over the next few years. It is guided by a group of thoroughly professional and well-connected artists here and in Vancouver.

For purists there were pictures of tall ships under full sail on the open sea, enshrined in heavy gold frames with engraved name plaques—Robert Macvittie's work for example. Minutely detailed photo-realism by Edward Spears deserved attention and will surely please the seaside set, whose taste for detail is well known. Victoria's own breed of top flight watercolourists were well represented—Harry Heine, Brian Travers-Smith and the remarkable Brian Johnston. Johnston can take the very essence of watercolour, that balance between accident and accuracy, and handle it with a virtuosity bordering on magic.

Over one hundred works in all were shown, and the next exhibit, scheduled for the fall of 1984, will be one to watch for. Doubtless a better location will be found.

Currently at Open Space is an exhibition of what might be called west coast funk art by four tremendously talented artists. Visting curator Daina Augaitis has gathered in the ingenious talents of four men who are inventors, not imitators.

George Sawchuck was a practising non-artist whose work was discovered by curators from all across the country who came to visit his home in Fanny Bay. Tom Nickson, a newcomer to Victoria, presents a 12-foot-high mask slathered with dark green engine grease. Buster Simpson of Seattle is a wicked and witty eco-active assembler whose crows, perched on crow-bars, are full of puns and imagination. And, at last, Jerry Pethick's sculptures have arrived locally for our enlightenment.

These works will be sent in June to the Mercer Union, Toronto's trendsetting artists' gallery. This simple fact is remarkable in that it is just about the first time Toronto has taken note of west coast culture. These are the finest exponents of an indigenous art form.

For king and Quadra

On Saturday March 17, as part of a cross-Canada tour, King Juan Carlos of Spain and his Greek wife Queen Sofia will visit Vancouver Island—Comox, Lester Pearson College and Victoria. The trip will culminate with the unveiling of a monument to Admiral Juan Francisco de la Bodega Y Quadra (identified more succinctly in government press releases as “Cuadra”) in the parkette on the harbour at Belleville and Oswego Streets. The monument, a bronze bust of the 18th-century navigator, will be presented to the city by the Spanish government, and henceforth the parkette will be known as Quadra Park.

In 1775 a tiny, 36-foot ship named Sonora became separated from its escort on a trip up the west coast. Captain Quadra, its commander, sighted the mountains of Vancouver Island and pushed on all the way to Alaska. He claimed rights to the area for Spain but these were later usurped by British and American traders.

After years of exploration and adventure, Quadra and Capt. George Vancouver met in 1792. Together they negotiated the opening of the region. To indicate his high personal regard for Quadra, Vancouver named the site of their meeting “Quadra and Vancouver’s Island.”

Now, little more than place names remain to indicate the Spanish presence which opened up the Pacific Northwest. And, as J.S. Kendricks informs us, “most of the Spanish place names which appear on our maps were given later by an Hispanophile Royal Navy Captain named Richards when he was surveying the coast in HMS Plumper.”

Kendricks is a member of the Galiano Historical and Cultural Society, a group which will be taking this opportunity to make a presentation to the King and Queen. This will take the form of a new print by Galiano Island artist Renaldo Norden, depicting the Spanish ship Sutil arriving at Friendly Cove in 1792. The Sutil, the last Spanish vessel to explore the coast, is the subject of much interest on Galiano Island, which was named after the Sutil’s captain, Dionisio Alcala Galiano. At the moment, the islanders are preparing to build a replica of that ship as a floating museum and training vessel.

The bust of Quadra will be unveiled at Quadra Park at 3 pm, Saturday, March 17 by the King and Queen. Monarchists please take note.

TRACES OF DISCOVERY by Jerry Pethick.
Vancouver Art Gallery (682-5621) until Mar. 25

The New home of the Vancouver Art Gallery is at heart a rotunda, a luminous space with a heavenly classical dome high above. Visitors rise beyond Emily Carr's forest undergrowth on curving staircases and on open escalators—one is drawn up and up. This month, works by Andy Warhol and David Hockney greet viewers on the ascent, and giant striped items by Molinari and Tousignan come to life in the wide well-lit spaces (as they never do on the pages of art magazines). The escalators carry one yet higher, to arrive with vertiginous pleasure at the top level, up near the cool splendour of the skylit dome, the source of light and very symbol of intelligence.

Here a true gallery encircles the rotunda, a final floor pushed up to the ceiling of the generous space. Ornaments and capitals of ancient architectural orders are seen close-up, out of scale in the new low rooms. But the effect lends the prestige of the ages to the most modern art. Into this hybrid atmosphere of history and light comes Jerry Pethick's exhibit Traces of Discovery: Seurat/Lippmann and the 1909 Air Show.

A Pethick sculpture does more than sit forlornly in a gallery. His assemblages of unlikely materials send out rainbow outriders of reflected and refracted light. Portrait busts made of light bulbs and curious lenses instantly engage the viewer, and the pure pleasure of deciphering these "traces of discovery" begins effortlessly.

This show was first seen last fall at the Canadian Cultural Centre in Paris. Scott Watson, curator at the Vancouver Art Gallery, described Pethick's sources and intentions for the Parisiens: "The ferment of activity in Paris at the end of the 19th century and the early years of the 20th was a moment of imaginative freedom where science was still practised by individuals and the commerce of ideas between scientists, artists and engineers produced a vision of reality we still have not come to terms with. Somehow, with bits of shiny plastic and bathtub-caulking calligraphy, Pethick reveals the significance of the meeting of Duchamp, Leger and Brancusi at the 1909 Paris Air Show. "The moment of truth, as Pethick imagines it, was to see the propeller dematerialize into a translucent disc," explains Watson.

Pethick's sculpture "The Dynamics of Power": challenging and satisfying

In fact, Pethick's assemblages dematerialize under the gallery lights. Projected by illumination, the images rise up from the mundane materials and dance in the spaces of illusion. With him we go through the looking glass into a wonderland where his images and our memories vividly connect; the sculptures unfold their magic as each viewer sees his own shadow and reflection and movement in all those mirrors. The colours are not pigment but broken light, emerging pure and intense from prisms and glass beads, living only in our perceptions.

Pethick is 49 years old, a gap-toothed inventor most at home in the Teredo Room at the Hornby Island Pub. Though the esoteric blarney of Hegel and Wittgenstein figures in the explanation of his intentions, a Ph.D. is not essential. Even babies coo and chuckle the moment his work comes in sight.

Pethick does just what interests him, in his own way, and the results are so pure and complete that the world seems to resound in sympathy.

On the cover of the splendid colour catalogue is a photo of a typical piece. A snow tire acts as a base for an enamelled washing-machine tub which in turn supports an aluminum pot studded with stone spectrafoil strips are stuck on a plate glass disc, a light bulb and shards of glass form the Eiffel tower and an umbrella. This is titled "The Dynamics of Power." It is hard to believe that these relics from the Hornby Island dump, deconstructed by ambient light, can yield an experience both challenging and satisfying. Yet hundreds who flocked to the opening found this to be so.

EXTRA BIAS

Why do major art exhibitions by local artists in Victoria galleries go unnoticed? For example, why has the recent one-woman exhibition by Millicent Shapiro at the Backroom Gallery gone unreviewed? I would think that one of Monday's mandates would be to foster and encourage public interest in the arts of this city by reviewing all such events. A professional art critic has been long overdue and should be hired on a full time basis by Monday. It is not good enough to allow just anyone to fill this important position by merely "reporting" on certain events considered worthy, reflecting either the extreme bias of the editor or the reporter, or doing so in order to fill up an empty space in the paper.

Without media coverage, art galleries will close and our artists will leave for other centres where art exhibitions are considered a valuable asset to the cultural growth and heritage of the city.

ENTHUSIASTIC AWARENESS

Robert Amos has done it again! He has thrown away all the parochialism often displayed in Victoria and has taken us to the Vancouver Art Gallery ("A delightful alchemy of light," Art, Feb. 24-Mar. 1).

By his "word picture," he has glided us up those open escalators to Jerry Pethick's visions of sculptured light. I get "goose bumps" with anticipation at, again, seeing those Molinari and Tousignant works and finally, to arrive, "upwardly mobile" at the level of a real high, with Pethick's work.

We have to thank Robert for his enthusiastic awareness of oriental art in the past, here in Victoria. Now, we are made aware of our good fortune in having him write as art critic for Monday.

Do let's hang onto him! So often our artists and writers drift away to other centres where there is more appreciation and awareness of excellence.

KENT TATE and JOE AVERAGE at Open Space, 510 Fort. St., 388-8833,
until Feb. 10

To its credit, Open Space is always tossing out something unexpected these days. The effect of the Tate/Average display is very tonic. One is not daunted, and there is no need to gush— it is bracing, like vodka or some new-age after-shave.

Every window and skylight has been covered over, and all the lights replaced with blue bulbs, an effect which makes the colours of the installation jump. In the centre of the floor, a cardboard Stuka fighter plane has crash landed, nose-dived deep into the floor. A heap of white gravel spills out of the cockpit, from which a meandering path leads into a little black house—a dog house, a death house, a spirit house of a bleak modern sort. Inside, more white gravel and the vacant hum of a black and white TV turned on and covered with some sort of white scum. Nothing doing. The mood is empty— The Day After. Japanese koto music drifts through the air, the sublime ordinariness of plucked strings bringing us back to the surface, like waking up out of an anaesthetic. Welcome to 1984.

The effect is art. Not commercialism, with 20 little etchings hanging in a row waiting to be purchased. Not the -isms of academe or statements of polemics. When the Reagonaut crashes and the TV set goes blank, what then? 1984.

Joe Average’s oil pastel drawings are pinned to the wall to greet us when we awake after the crash. And in a marvellous, dumb way, they welcome us to 1984. Bright scribbled colours and flashcard format restrain our blanked-out brains. Joe doesn’t mess around. Each picture is obvious, and labelled as well. Cat. Dogfish. Actor. In addition the name “Joe Average” and the date “1984” are written large, right on the front. No shadings or obscurity— no time for that now. Remarkably, this work seems without precedent, without sophistication, almost without ego. This simplicity is compelling and at the same time playful, pretty, dumb. This show will be remembered later as an authentic expression of the times, more than anything else we’ve seen. If there’s anyone around to remember, that is.

“On EVERY beach there are special different kinds of stories. Up at Sombrio are stones that are rust coloured, a bright, bright orange. On Whiffin Spit there are some lovely purple stones, very vivid. Botanical Beach has a lot of tiny red ones and clear white transparent stones; greens, blues, every colour you can imagine,” Karen Harris is reporting on her search for materials for her latest project. She has spent the past six months making a 12-metre-long mosaic pavement by the water’s edge on Whiffin Spit. It’s so close to the sea that the waves sometimes washed up and splashed Harris and her helper Francine Leclair as they poured concrete and laid in stones and tiles. “We poured concrete in all kinds of weather but it was wonderful working outside,” she reported. This pavement will be the centrepiece of a seaside terrace to be constructed for the Sooke Harbour House Restaurant. Last year Harris laid a mermaid mosaic into the sidewalk in front of this popular restaurant. The 5,000 tiles were hand-cut using materials from Bob’s Tile Hut and Tile Town in Victoria. This year instead of cutting the tiles, she broke them into pieces and added stones gathered during a month on the local beaches. Then came another month of excavation and site preparation and a month constructing the plywood forms for the concrete. This was a bit complex, because there’s not a straight line in the whole thing. Finally, the workers spent two months laying the mosaic in shapes of abalone, mussel, urchin, starfish and moon-stud. The inspiration for the design came from the adjacent waters. Not surprisingly, Harris is a recent convert to the sport of snorkelling. “I don’t know why everybody doesn’t snorkel. This coast is one of the best places in the world for diving. No matter what the weather is like, just pop on a wetsuit—it’s so calm underwater. It’s just like breathing exercises only you’re seeing beautiful things at the same time.” Harris is a self-taught artist. She has always had a passion for making things and, though a high school dropout, she was accepted at the Vancouver College of Art. Unfortunately because she was not a mature student she couldn’t get a student loan. “So I thought I’d teach myself,” she remembers. At 22 she suddenly became famous as the illustrator of Hymenochita Storm’s book Seven Arrows. Researching and doing the paintings for the book was an inspiration—“it really shook some things loose in my head.” But what of the commercialism that came with success? “People were phoning me from New York, wanting me to design wallpaper. The inappropriateness really turned me off.”

She found herself at Brandon University in Manitoba taking native studies and religion while she studied the Sioux language on the side. Since returning to the west coast she has had two projects in Sooke, working under the enlightened patronage of Sooke Harbour House restaurateur Sinclair Philip. She is now on her way to explore Montana with her husband, but she’ll be back before long. What will her next project be like? “There are so many beautiful spots in the wilderness where it would be nice to leave the mark of people, in the way that the petroglyphs are left. These would be ‘ceramicglyphs’, in carefully chosen spots that no one knows about—pack in a jug of water and some tile grout and go do something appropriate.”

WILLIAM S. BROWN at Open Space Gallery. 510 Fort St., 383-8333, until Dec. 17.

These pictures of Brown, almost life-size, are profound yet playful. Humour and joy pull us into a dialogue on those questions which the world poses to every Walter Mitty. What would it be like to "carry the world on your shoulders?" He shows us. Yet the ideas are never treated in a heavy-handed or dramatic way, for without the humour how could we face images like his "carrot-chaser" (a man whose head-dress dangles a carrot just out of reach)?

Buster Keaton is acknowledged by Brown as his biggest inspiration. He noted that, while Charlie Chaplin used his hands and feet, "Keaton is a physical comic—he uses his whole body. He's an everyday man but he has his heroic moments. Our dreams are embodiments of these kind of things." Indeed, the man on the street instantly recognizes his own dreams and half-formed ideas in Brown's images.

An historical relationship between this art work and the costume dramas of Vancover's Dr. Brute and Mr. Peanut exists, but printed up big, about four by five feet. To him they are "poetic cartoons, poetic in that you can get the sense of them by trying to put yourself in the picture."

The pictures have a consistent theme. "It's the little man up against the big world, trying to come to terms with what he sees around him." Brown is seen carrying a brick wall strapped to his back. In the next scene he is flattened on the sidewalk, crushed by the weight of the wall. "These things happen all the time," says Brown, "but without the costume."

The artist loves making the costumes, for instance the big headpiece that turns him into a human claw-hammer. He further absorbs the image during performance and re-evaluates it again while staging the photographs. The end result is an image of an idea which engages the viewer with remarkable efficiency—we get the message.

HAVE YOU ever thought of attaching big springs to your toes, the better to jump to conclusions? How about a propeller on your ear? How about a propeller on your ear? Here comes a man with a question mark instead of a head—he's overwhelmed by questions. It's got to the point where he has to give them away to street. He gave me one: "who is this?"

He's William S. Brown of Toronto, making his west coast debut at Open Space. Using before a plain backdrop, Brown shows simple costumes and represents ideas which are photographed and then printed up big, about four by five feet. To him they are "poetic cartoons, poetic in that you can get the sense of them by trying to put yourself in the picture."

Party cruising

The redhead wore a fluorescent orange plastic mini-skirt belted with orange plastic triangles, like pants at a construction site—turned-up ose and turned up toes. Is this a costume or just what one wears to go and hear the Day-Glo Abortions?

At 541 Johnson the Day-Glos were laying down a heavy version of Jimi Hendrix's "Purple Haze" and a small crowd had gathered to peer in through the windows. Formerly a used clothing store, the Metropole was a dance hall Saturday night. The entrance was like a scene from the bombing of Dresden—round the corner, over bricks and rubble, to the end of a dark alley: pretty spooky. The doorman drew a skull on our hands and let us in to the one big room. Rockin' leather, skinheads, studs and mohawks milled about inside; everyday is Hallowe'en for this crowd. The ghouls and the grim reaper give it a nice homey feeling.

A Hallowe'en farewell party is an appropriate and spirited way to allay the ghosts of a used clothing store.

Outside, a tubular caterpillar approaches, dragging its tail. Two cabaret 'stars dart around the corner in a flash of top hats and net stockings. Penis-nose is drinking from a brown paper bag.

Up the street and over two blocks we meet the Fan Tan Alley Hallowe'en party, a tradition now in its fourth year. This time Luis Ituarte hi-jacked it as his art project. Brilliant poster designs were part of the campaign, and he added painted backdrops to the action and called it a "social sculpture." Ticket prices ($25 a couple) and three security guards kept out unexpected guests, which was a pity. It's important that a Hallowe'en party be full of tricks and treats.

Of course the alley is a great spot for a party. The crowd inside strutted and pawked, and wandered up the back steps to the old fan tan club, now called the New Era. Safe and warm and close together, they paraded past Bill Mulley's Band and chattered. Down in the alley the crowd was too thin to keep away the evening's chill. The ticket buyers were not the sort of crazies who make a party go.

The costumes are the best part of the show. Behind a mask a special protection fosters boldness; those who didn't dress up are a bit naked and uneasy. But it's alright to stare, and not necessary to reveal anything. Leaning in the alley, voyeurs can observe with impunity as the monk and the garter belt girl grope in the half-light.

We walked over to a party in one of the super new suites above the Herald Street Caffe. This was not a real Hallowe'en party. Quiet couples faced one another over a black marble table with a huge glass beaker filled with dozens of white gladioli. Not having entered the spirit of the thing, these people scarcely knew what to make of two ravenous leopards who fell on the very ripe gouda and dipped their cardboard noses in the wine.

Later, in a storefront next to the former Stones Gallery, artists were flocking to the other Chinatown party, a celebration for those who balked at the entrance fee to Fan Tan Alley. The host, in underclothing, a see-through raincoat and a stocking pulled over his head, laid out splendid eats at the back of his studio. Out front, in his "after-hours ping-pong club", the music was lethal, and a space cadet boogied intently with a catwoman.

We left well past the witching hour, but in time to watch a midget carrying a giant on his back. Together, they climbed into a waiting cab. Is it a trick? To be out late and incognito is definitely a treat.

The crowd paid $3 to get in to Lund's Fine Art and Antiques Auction. But they're spilling out onto Fort Street, in the midst of the turmoil - a voice from the sidewalk pipes up. "What lot are we at?" "Eighty-three," says the auctioneer, "a carriage clock." "Sixteen hundred" kids the voice from outside.

Lund's saves the best items from their weekly sales of furniture and so on, and holds a sale "of interest to collectors" now and then. Prices in the art market are low this year, a factor which has slowed the former flood-tide of treasures to auction, but the audience was studded with some of Victoria's choicest relics. Enamelled artefacts of advanced age took supper early and made the trip in from Oak Bay: bulky old ladies with the poise of Queen Victoria were ensconced on cushions, ready to bid thousands with a slight inclination of their spectacles; every dealer in town was there, one teaching his young sons the trade. And the man from the archives stood very cool, off to the side, like an undercover RCMP agent on a stake-out.

"Let's open with 500. Five hundred. Do I have 500?" Auctioneer John Boyle goes into his pitch. The gravity of his position, behind a carved lectern, is impressive. He is wearing a neat dark suit, with half-lens reading glasses, and gold cuff links flashing as he acknowledges bids to the left and right. "And 600, do I hear 505? Six-fifty, do I hear seven? Seven hundred, and five?" As other towns have a patron saint, said Boyle, he has a patron joke: "It's only money," he quips, enjoying familiarity with our hopes and dreams. "Lovely big carpet here, good strong colours, a nice rug for the dining room." Does he realise it won't show the squashed peas?

One of the nicest polar rugs we've had here," Boyle recommends. A sword cane, a tantalus, a commodore chair - the parade of obsolete, antique and just plain old items continues. "From an estate," he tells us. The vision of a widow comes to mind, pruning "four antling place card holders in the shape of wisbons" from the silver cabinet.

A low table, a naiveté, a vignette. Lot number 145. "Bronze head of a viking with antlers," is withdrawn. Didn't he say the police took it away?

Staff boys in red jackets hoist antique dressers up onto the block and sweep them down again. In their rude fists pairs of sugar tongs or Crown Derby tea sets look dangerously fragile. Seventy-five lots an hour are knocked down by the auctioneer.

The feature of tonight's sale is an Emily Carr oil on paper, Sea and Sky. The bidding starts at $10,500 and it's slowed though the kids reach $11,300. A lot of paraphernalia from her House of All Sorts comes up next - Klee Wyck pottery she made to sell; squat and lumpy like Emily herself; postcards, her eased, a scrapbook. It's only valuable by association. Why else pay $110 for a painted tree fungus?

A rather awful painting of two clowns by Max Bates comes up. The audience is equally divided between those who think that, for $900, it's a splendid bargain or a tremendous waste. A 7x5-ft. oriental rug for $450, a mantle clock which begins chiming as the price hits $625, a Victorian button-backed settee for $350 - "my mother had one just like that," says the lady in the next seat. There is a warm fellow-feeling in the room. A beaming grandmother clutching a small painting makes her way out through the crowd. The man who buys number 247, "carved wooden Blackamoor floorlamp," smiles sheepishly on the sidewalk beside it.

The big turnout of patrons is taken as a good sign - confidence is returning to the art market. "Eight fifty, do I hear nine, nine, nine hundred? I have nine hundred, any advance on nine hundred? Going once ..." Some buyers will send their purchases to shops and sales in other cities.

"Going twice." The new mah jong set ($110) or the pair of Capo di Monte figurines ($450) will enter personal collections. "Sold to the man on the left. Your initials please. D.T? I'll drink to that." Entertainment, action, and the real life thrill that you might buy the "18th century child's rocking chair from Woburn Abbey."
Walken plays the ideal scientist, dedicated to discovery, driven by curiosity and creativity—and uncompromising. He gives a compelling performance. The late Natalie Wood plays his wife who is about to leave him, which prompts his heroine, in a moving, charming scene, to replay his videorecorded memories of their romance.

Louise Fletcher, best known for her Oscar-winning portrayal as Nurse Ratched in One Flew Over the Cuckoo's Nest, gives a similar performance as the creative colleague of Walken. Obsessed with her work, she is struck with a fatal heart attack while at the lab, but is able to record her dying moments on videotape, moments which Walken later vicariously experiences.

Her death is a scene of controlled underplaying, and her transcendence from her physical pain to spiritual consciousness is marvelously sublime. If there is a fault with the film, it's here. Trumbull pulls out all the stops, and gives us a dazzling light show, but the special effects seem inadequate. Perhaps we are jaded by the sophisticated special effects we have already seen, but it's more likely that the task is impossible—to record the ultimate experience, and put into visual images what is indescribable. Even so, the attempt is still daring.

In Brainstorm, Trumbull re-introduces the 70mm format, in hiding since 1971, to reveal the point of view of people using the brain-can device; it's a bit like seeing the world through a wide-angle lens, and quite three-dimensional. He switches from 70mm to the standard 35mm format unobtrusively and effectively.

Instead of sensationalizing or playing down to its audience, Brainstorm is a serious attempt to break new ground, to use special effects as more than folks, and to examine the deeper aspects of life and death. That it succeeds is remarkable. See it before the lines get too long.

ART

OPEN SPACE OPENS UP

Victoria's hidden public downtown gallery is suddenly very different. It's starting to sound like the good old days all over again.

WORD is getting around. "Have you been up to Open Space?" The ivory tower is opening up to street life again. The chill is off, the thaw is here, there is real open space again. They've even had two rockabilly dances within a month on the shiny new floor, and film nights are running every other Wednesday. And, most surprising, an exhibition of 15 downtown artists from Fan Tan Alley in the gallery.

The committee that hired Michael Harding as the new curator of visual arts, experimental film and all-round energetic housekeeping has certainly picked a winner. Harding is a hustler who seems to understand that "a hermetic monument to the arts is not a cultural centre. The city itself is a cultural centre." Those words, from the first Open Space prospectus in 1971, have been brought back to 510 Fort Street by Harding.

He likes the high-profile—visiting artists in their studios, appearing on TV and radio, and constantly in attendance at Open Space, welcoming the many artists of Victoria who, for reasons economic or xenophobic, have been bastarded down in their studios.

Of course, it was always intended that way. In 1971 Gene Miller, 28 years old and "just off the boat," met Sam Bawlf and told him "about his hope to create a downtown cultural centre, which he proposed to call Open Space." Sam's reaction was generally doubting. He more or less said: "I've met a lot of people who want to do something of that sort. They talk about it for six months, then they disappear. It can't be done. It's not going to happen. And, by the way, there's an unused warehouse on Fort Street."

Miller moved in with his sleeping bag and started rounding up support and talent. The plans called for a theatre in what is now the gallery space. Downstairs was a craft market, open from Fort Street through to Bastion Square.

The idea took off like a shot. "The Open Space was exciting, dangerous. Victorians, used to polite environments... were suddenly being challenged to witness the less controlled, often excessive outputs of energy by artists and performers in the grotesque-like setting of Open Space," said Miller at the time. "It's really an attitude more than anything else." This place, before the Association of Non-Profit Artist Run Centres, or Berne Rehn's Craft Fairs, gripped the locals in a creative outpouring of theatre groups and workshops, chamber music, avant-garde art shows, and even a 25-day festival of the arts.

Sustained, organized activity among artists is a rare thing. Politics and funding have a way of derailing pure creativity. After four years of riding the wild wind at Open Space, Miller left to start Monday Magazine. Later, Bill Bartlett took over Open Space as artistic director, administrator, and jack-of-all-trades, the only paid staff member. The space had become less of an expansion of the street, less a mall for crasspeople, and more of an art gallery. In 1976 Open Space received a precedent-setting grant from the National Museums of Canada in the form of $75,300 with which to purchase the building at 510 Fort Street. The artist-run society now had a stable base, an almost unique situation. The ground floor was leased to provide revenue and Open Space retired upstairs.

With this new stability came a widening definition of the functions of Open Space. It was now perceived to be an art gallery and, answering a need, became a venue for performers and art shows travelling under the sponsorship of the Canada Council. By this time management of finances was almost a full-time job, but of course there was no one but Bartlett and his army of volunteers to do the job. In 1978, when he packed it in to pursue research into slow-scan video on Pender Island, Open Space was going through a bad patch economically. Jeanne Castor, the new administrator, admits "we had horrible financial problems." Exhaustive renovations, bad debts and a not very remunerative lease arrangement with the Legal Aid Society downtown were sapping its vitality. Open Space was no longer a three-ring circus of freedom and fun.

During the next few years Open Space seemed boring—it was holding tight. Effort and money were put into invisible things—negotiating the lease with the new tenant, Koto Restaurant; balancing the budget; paying old debts. Soon the grant money began to flow again, but it went to the artists rather than to publicity and administration. "The last sort of thing we want to do is to support ourselves on the people that we're meant to support," says Jeanne Celona. Couldn't she have had artists perform for free, just to liven up the place? "To allow them to perform for free is politically incorrect," she feels. Open Space pays at least the minimum fees to artists as stipulated by Canadian Artists Representatives. "As a percentage of our overall budget we pay better than most anybody. This is a laudable position, but nobody seemed to know what was going on at Open Space.

From Fan Tan Alley artists' exhibition: a commitment to local artists

It wasn't only lack of publicity that made Open Space seem boring to the man on the street during the last few years—if he ever came in off the street and climbed the long stairway up to the gallery. Greg Snider and his successor Barbara Fischer were two curators of visual arts with a similar aesthetic. Academic, formal and international in their references, they presented exhibits which challenged the viewer but often offered little immediate gratification for the untrained. It is traditional to be puzzled by modern art and these two brought it in plenty to puzzle over.

Guest curators were engaged during this period to keep fresh ideas before the public, but this was often perceived as a way of dropping in out-of-town friends by "parachute", an insult to the local talent who responded with a cold shoulder. Probably the most oft-heard grumble about Open Space is "why don't they show more local?" Oddly enough, though lots of locals have shown there, they tend to be ones who are not well-known—neither vocal, old guard, nor commercial—and they are therefore not perceived as "local." Jean Wilkinson's Funeral for Salute, Jessica Stockholder's paintings on the wall, and Vito Ceili's constructed paintings didn't get the attention they so justly deserved. And yet that's just what Open Space is for—the unknown, the untried. The realpolitik of the situation is that grants are given by national juries to whom the question of locality count for little. Made up of artists from across the country, they recognize talent from whatever quarter.

Artists in other disciplines don't have this xenophobic problem. Virtually every writer in the country has been here, and it's all free. Jill Swartz held a Festival of Women writers last year—15 women writers from across Canada headlined by Phyllis Webb—attended by about 450 people. The Sound Poetry Festival brought in a good crowd to see The Four Horsemen and the festival format gave less well-known performers exposure to the same audience.

Tom Gore, who called himself a "grand old man of Open Space," has been plotting the strategy of the photographic programs there for eight years. His projects, under the title Secession Gallery, were "not a camera club sort of thing." Yet, in his opinion, the photo displays "were not as avant garde as the rest of the visual program."" Over the years so many artists have incorporated photography into their works that "pure photography" has been subsumed by the visual program in general. This year other curators are creating exhibits on Cinema in Photography (including work by Marlon Penner Rates and Fred Douglas, among others). And Gore will bring us new work by photographers of the Los Angeles area.

The music program at Open Space has made Victoria a nodal point on the map in the world of computer music. Certainly it is the home of the most extreme forms of new music in Victoria, more so even than UVic's Sonic Lab. Under the leadership of internationally-renowned composer/performer John Coletti, Open Space has concentrated on a mix of real time electroacoustic performance and computer-generated sounds. Monday's music writer, James Kennedy, reports that the audiences are small and loyal: "You don't see that audience anywhere else. They are appreciative of these programs which Kennedy says are "literally at the cutting edge of new music." That's a long way from the days when Kennedy played first cumber with Charles Coward's Vegetable Orchestra in Open Space's boisterous first year.

The video program at Open Space has been on hold for a couple of years now while coordinator Chris Creighton-Kelly has been in Vancouver studying. From there he has arranged cabaret of Canadian artists in Victoria and all across the country in a project called Coating the Cable. Chris took on the video work at Open Space from Bill Bartlett, who had introduced loads of new energy to the space with his Collaborations projects. Now the video hardware is used occasionally to document local events, awaiting Creighton-Kelly's return.

It's Open Space's visual arts program that most people ponder. Is somebody putting us on? Is this what they teach at art school? Who's paying for this? Viewers arrive at the door with questions like these clouding...
Part of Open Space's visual arts program: public appreciation is clouded their appreciation. Nick Beda, a Masters in Art student at University of Victoria, built the "I" welded steel sculpture call Test Pattern. It was installed on the Dallas Road forecourt this August, and achieved notoriety on the front page of the Times-Colonist. "Some local people were pretty angry about it," he ventured. "It was unbolted and pulled down with a truck." Perhaps someone didn't know that it was only temporary.

The shape of the work is based on the gesture you make when you go outside, and put your arm down to test if it's going to rain, a gesture that links you with the environment rather than with another person." The arm reaches out and results in an umbrella; he replaced the hand by the object it reaches for. Clouds and bird shapes surround the umbrella. Beda spent quite a bit more money making the piece than he received for the project. The sculpture is now in storage and he has no further plans to exhibit it.

Open Space is putting a lot of effort into opening up these days. The Outdoor Projects of last summer were part of the attempt, though many failed—the works were poorly sited and showed little sensitivity to local concerns. They were generally discrete and entirely ephemeral, with no lasting effect. More successful in bringing an audience to art has been the double-decker bus tours initiated by Open Space. Low prices, "in-flight" commentary by artists, and plenty of stop-overs at various galleries are only part of the attraction and more trips are planned. But there is little doubt the best thing they've done along these lines is to hire Michael Harding.

When the subject of local art comes up, Harding's position is clear: 'I'll show it if it's good. It's immaterial where it comes from. In fact, I'd like to get the local art shown not only here, but in other cities, other countries. That would help the artist. If you have the opportunity to expand your work will improve. A lot of people these days are subject to self-imposed victim-thinking, feeling very isolated. We have to keep our supporters and mechanisms for support accessible so that we don't end up becoming really introspective, in which case the art becomes really esoteric. If somebody encourages you, you do really well.'

One of the first things Harding did was to invite the artists of Fan Tan Alley to show at Open Space. Here was a signal approach: almost a town and gown situation, resolved. "I am aware that this gallery has a certain amount of prestige and it's really nice to be able to offer it to people. That's what you're meant to do with prestige—give it away." The artists were delighted with the prestige—and even more pleased to be paid an artist's fee. (The show continues until October 29.)

"You've got to give people what they want. Then you can add a few little benders. In fact, if you give people what they want, they will think of their own little benders." Harding's "little benders" are messages about harmony, world peace and disarmament. He's on the board of the United Nations Association and his main interest is linking art to other aspects of life. He's already hard at work on the Disarmament Show, set to open on Good Friday next year, the anniversary of the peace marches which mobilized tens of thousands in 1983. The visual section of the show will include local material and items solicited from around the globe. "The peace movement is still using images from the 1960s. If we can put together some very hot promotional images about disarmament, they will be of real use to the movement." Doubtless it will be more than a picture show.

"I want to have a religious service held in the gallery," he ventures, remembering the ecumenical service which was part of the Human Rights Day he coordinated at Vancouver's Unit Pitt Gallery last year. His enthusiasm is focused, well-directed, and infectious. We haven't even mentioned his Western Canadian experimental filmmakers series, or Totalitarian Visions, a photo show to celebrate (?) Orwell's 1984. Open Space is wide open and welcoming, and just might be the place that can bring together the collective dreams of this town's many artists.

LUIS ITUARTE, Fan Tan Alley, to Nov. 5

FOUR sculptures eight feet tall at the entrance to Fan Tan Alley on Fisgard Street will mark the entrance to a very ambitious project by Victoria artist Luis Ituarte. Over the next two weeks he'll be installing and completing 28 canvasses to create part of a multi-media show cum civic ritual.

On October 22 the Chinese orchestra of the Dart Coon Club will make music in the alley, from 7:30-9:30 pm; everyone is welcome. The big finale will be a Hallowe'en party, by invitation only, on October 29. Five hundred "free" invitations are available for a "contribution" of $15, couples $25, by calling 383-2361. Any surplus funds go to the Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association.

Fan Tan Alley has hosted some extraordinary Hallowe'en events in the past and this year's, while a lot more expensive, may outdo them all. Ituarte has planned everything. In various alley studios three bands will be on hand—Hoi Polloi, Blues Contraband, and Bill Mulley's Jazz Ensemble. Adult refreshments, security attendants, and first aid will be provided.

The old world charm of Fan Tan Alley, its history and significance to the Chinese community, mixed with the magic of Hallowe'en are sure to bring out a rich play of creativity. That must be what Ituarte has in mind when he says he wants to "incorporate the social phenomena to an art event as an element of a total concept"—his painting, your costume, everybody's good time in Fan Tan Alley. A social sculpture, he calls it.

Fresh and friendly

VARIOUS ARTISTS, Winchester Gallery, 1545 Fort St., 595-2777

It’s hard to get past the strong sense of déjà vu at 1545 Fort Street, once Kyle’s, with paintings by Toni Onley and Max Maynard in the window. But the sign now says Winchester Gallery, and owners Marilyn Cunningham and Bernard Raffo have brought a fresh and friendly presence to the place.

Raffo and Cunningham were formerly the proprietors of Kyle’s Framing, a well-managed business which earned the respect of the dozens of artists they dealt with.

When Paul Kyle finally bit the financial bullet, the framers decided to set up their own gallery. After all, they were in touch with plenty of good artists, a very supportive public and a super sky-lit three-level gallery was up for grabs next door.

Thrills and novelty are what art lovers love. And though both were in short supply at Sunday’s opening, the abundant browsers could see a fine selection of small safe items by artists long familiar in that space. Well-chosen items by Jack Wise, Colin Graham, and Jack Wilkinson joined those of newcomers Milli Shapiro and Nina Cape. Strong and serious artists Phyllis Serota and Susan King will be part of the new stable, but their thematic depth could only be hinted at in a show as eclectic as this opener. Buyers seemed to be taking a “wait-and-see” attitude but the calm demeanour and solid reputation of the owners should breed confidence.

And the new season will hold some pleasant surprises. Yumie Kono Day’s etchings are calm, mysterios and understated and deserve our full attention. And Radisha Light in October: when Jerry Pethick was written up in Monday (June 18, 1982) the story was titled “From Holograms to the Hornby Island Dump.” Now Pethick has turned that proverbial sow’s ear into a silk purse, making the jump from the dump to Paris, France. The Canadian Cultural Centre is currently presenting Pethick’s dazzling light sculptures to the discerning French until October 23.

“more gossip, scandal and secrets about this little bit of Olde England” says the book’s cover. Here’s a random sample from inside:

“It seems a lovely but slim-chested maid-en was lamenting the size of her bust when she was confronted by a kind fairy. ‘You may have any wish you desire,’ the fairy said. ‘I want two big boobs!’ the maiden cried. ‘You shall have them!’ the fairy said, waving her hand. Lightning cracked and smoke rose. As it cleared, there stood Vic Stephens and Davie Barrett.”

Dick Geisreiter
and his forever flowers

WHEN Dick Geisreiter stands working at his bench, he knows just what he is doing. In our age, when the romantic image of the sculptor is some moody soul communing with the material (“I just chip away and reveal what’s in the stone”), Geisreiter’s sureness is refreshing—he makes metal flowers.

“Metal flowers? Isn’t that just a bit of kitsch?” Indeed it can be. But Geisreiter is a man with the skill and imagination to elevate craftshop bric-a-brac to the realms of art.

To start with, this man knows his flowers. His grandfather started the family florist business in California years ago, and when Geisreiter was a lad his father had “a city block under glass”. He grew up growing and arranging, and operated the business himself for years. In addition, the refinements of ikebana (Japanese flower arranging) and bonsai (miniature trees) became second nature to him through years of study. He had 1500 bonsai trees and used to be a statewide judge of bonsai in California. Geisreiter’s irrepressible talent led him from floral work to metal sculpture and his own gallery in Mendocino, California. Then, in 1970, with his wife and three boys, he packed it all up and moved to the remote island of Sointula, near the north end of Vancouver Island. Though he is a grandfa-

I, the lightness, the composition, might never appear. —

As well as floral arrangements, Geisreiter makes tiny welding-rod bonsai trees which grip convoluted Chinese-y rocks. Tray-garden scenes, table fountains and extensive outdoor works find their place in his repertoire.

In the studio storeroom the multiplicity of his forms is overwhelming. No shortcuts, no easy routes; but myriad essential forms derived from a lifetime of nature study and a wealth of colour teased out of the metal itself. Geisreiter’s work may never arrive at the mythical Museum of High Art. But his productions are loved and coveted. He’s never had to take a piece home after an exhibition, and likely this will be the case with his new show at the Quest for Handcrafts (1023 Government, 382-1934) until October 8.

The remarkable Mr. Bowie

EDDIE AND THE CRUISERS, Odeon, 383-0513

David Bowie is a better actor than he is a singer. Indeed, it is largely the force of his charismatic presence that keeps Merry Christmas, Mr.

ond world war, and it sets out a schematic opposition between two points of view: an obsessive absolutism, and pragmatic compromise. Interestingly, this dichotomy crosses racial barriers: for each point of view, there is one Japanese and one English representative.

The pragmatists are the Mr. Lawrence of the title, an English officer with some knowledge, understanding, and even sympathy for the Japanese way of life, played with weary, not-quite-disillusioned liberalism by Tom Conti. His counterpart is an easy-going, sensualist Japanese sergeant, Hara, played by an actor called Takeshi, whose face breaks into a thousand smiles as he delivers the title line. While these two pursue the "correct" line of rapprochement, the real intensity of the film is in the conflict.
IT COULDN'T have been a nicer opening. Colin Graham is surely one of the best-loved figures in Victoria's art world, both as administrator and, now, as an artist. And the Backroom Gallery retains a warm familiarity under its new director Heather Hestler. Sunday afternoon seems like the perfect time for gallery going, a time when a jovial group of makers and doers, teachers and communicators meet to peer over one another's shoulders at Graham's new work, and to raise a toast to a man whose efforts never fail to please.

Colin Graham was his usual self-effacing self. "I call these my 'Thurber Wine' paintings" he quipped. "As James Thurber has one of his characters say, 'it's just a naive little wine but I think you'll be amused by its presumption.'" In fact, Graham's paintings are anything but presumptuous—you could call them mellow, matured, with a splendid bouquet. Using gouache (an opaque watercolour), casein (a tempera with milk solids as its binder) and oil paint, he creates paintings of gentle blended colours, rich in harmonious middle tones. His subjects, gathered under the title Bucolic Pleasures, bespeak rural retirement: barns and sheds, sheep and woods lots. Mix in the wooden walls of the Backroom Gallery, a touch of Oak Bay tweed, the chill in the air and Graham's earthy colours, and you have a fruity punch somehow appropriate to the onset of autumn.

Colin was born in Vancouver in 1915 and attended Shawnigan Lake School. He took a degree in history at Cambridge University and then a Masters in Art at Berkeley. As an art educator he stayed on in California until invited to become the first director of the Victoria Art Gallery, a position he held from 1951 until 1974. The reduced responsibilities of director emeritus still kept him busy until 1980 when, like a Chinese scholar painter, he allowed himself the pleasure of full time painting.

Freedom of spirit informs his paintings, nourished by the deep roots of a lifetime of study. We may sometimes glimpse the looseness of Dufy or the incipient cubism of Cezanne in Graham's paintings. Perhaps due to his contact with Chinese art, clouds and trees are rendered in a shorthand that speaks of experience distilled, rather than nature rendered in the raw. Written symbols—a house, a cart—are arranged on the paper in a way that implies space with deceptive simplicity. Not for him the strictures of linear or atmospheric perspective. Sky, sea and mist retain a mystery which energizes the objects placed within them.

In the current exhibit Graham's work occasionally abandons the landscape reference almost entirely, as the artist surrounds us with leaf patterns or lets houses float freely, obedient only to the law of universal gravitation. Perhaps the vestiges of representation will drop away leaving us with abstract paintings. Is he interested in the power of emptiness? Graham says he has developed "a feeling of the transparency of matter as it is revealed by modern particle physics," a subject whose development he has watched with fascination over a period of 50 years. "At the sub-atomic level matter now seems to be more a question of energies and wave movements than solid substance."

Of course, fortified with a glass of wine and immersed in bubbling conversation, those at the opening perhaps admired the superficial aspects rather than the sub-atomic physics of Graham's work—clouds running in wet skies of deep purple while sheep pursue a lifetime of munching.

Midwives of art
VICTORIA'S ART CURATORS

ARTISTS come and artists go. And gallery backers like to keep well out of the limelight. But consider the tastemakers, those curators who choose and present the shows: the midwives of art.

Paul Kyle, for instance, was an obvious tastemaker in Victoria. He may have instilled artists, bankrupted his business and disaffected his patrons. But he had “taste”. He knew what he liked and his personal choice was stamped on every work that went through his gallery. He liked landscape abstractions—not too realistic, not too unrealistic. Consider Toni Oster, Max Maynard, Colin Graham, Anne Pepperwell, all purveyors of abbreviated scenery. Even artists without much interest in landscape—Jack Wise, Neil Dalrymple, Lin Chia-Shek—gave it a try, inspired by Kyle’s clear and consistent judgments.

These days, Victoria is short on curatorial direction. North Park Studio and Gallery Untitled seem to be willing to educate and cultivate an audience. They have decided what they are about and are willing to stand by it. But a lot of new galleries, financially anxious, cram the walls with a miscellanea of unsold work. Without curatorial direction, a pot-pourri can become a hodge-podge, a mish-mash. Indigestion sets in, leaving viewers without guidance or confidence. The scatter-gun approach to curators does not make its mark.

Institutional galleries, underwritten by the government, feed back to the source of their grants. Open Space has formerly been able to pursue academic elitism and arcane experimentation to the point of mind-numbing boredom. In September, a new curator for visual art takes over. He is Michael Harding, formerly of Vancouver’s Streetwise Unit Pitt Gallery. Let’s hope he can breathe some life into Open Space, if it’s not a dead issue.

Up at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, curator Greg Bellery has a new directive from the Canada Council. Only contemporary art shows will be funded by them. He’s bringing in David McWilliams and Arnold Shives from Vancouver and Pat Martin Bates of Victoria. Local Jack Kudler was re¬ fused a show in Victoria’s art gallery, then accepted by former AGGV director Roger Boulet in Burnaby. And sent on tour—back to Victoria.

The top curatorial talent in town is Barry Till, hard-working curator of Asian art at the AGGV. Last year he brought us Canada’s best Chinese paintings, a fine collection of porcelain and the splendid porcelains of the high Qing Dynasty. This year we will see the best Japanese paintings in the country, many of which belong to the AGGV. And Till is seeking gifts large and small, “raking the turf” of less active curators in other cities. He’s educating our taste without sacrificing his own standards. That’s what a curator is supposed to do. Victoria has an audience eager for art and there are plenty of good artists. It’s up to the curators to deliver the goods.

children gain some awareness—yet it doesn’t do that either. Though negligence or design, it is not only possible, but probable, that a child will go through the entire B.C. public school system without taking a single course in how the government of this provlence works. I’d be willing to wager that not one graduating student in a thousand could explain what a regional district is, let along what it does. For that reason alone, The Reins of Power is an important book for British Columbians, and should be read.

Make no mistake about it though; despite the gripping title, this is a textbook, not a treatise. So if you are expecting the exciting thrust and subjective intrigue generated in other books on B.C. politics, (The Company Province, by Martin Robins, and 1200 Days:
A Shattered Dream, by Lorne Kavic and Gary Nixon spring to mind) or the sync-phonic air of political biographies like Bennett, by Ben Morley, then I definitely recom-end you not read The Reins of Power lying down—unless you plan to cover your eyes with it.

If, on the other hand, you want to get behind the headlines being generated by the current debate on the government restraint program, then I highly recommend you pick up a copy and read chapters five and six, on managing the public service in B.C. You’ll be glad you did.

Other interesting chapters, given the current mood here, are The Premier and the Cabinet (by Walter Young and Terry Morley) and The Provincial-Municipal Relationship
(by Oak Bay alderman and UBC prof Neil Swainson).

Some knowledgeable readers will no doubt want to argue with a few of the assumptions and observations made by the five authors. For example, Young and Morley are way off base in crediting the rebuilding of the Social Credit party between 1972 and 1975 to Bill Bennett alone. How could they ignore the work of Grace McCarthy and Dan Campbell in that period? I also think the authors could have made wider use of tables and flow charts to guide the reader through the various bureaucracies under examination.

On the whole, however, this is a fine text and ought to be read by any serious student of B.C.’s political scene. In fact, I worry that anyone who professes to have an opinion about how the province is being run, I guess that takes in just about everyone, doesn’t it?

THE VANCOUVER ISLAND
INVITATIONAL. Art Gallery of Greater
Victoria (384-4101) until Oct. 3

THIS year’s Vancouver Island Invitational at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria features five painters.
In a show of more than usual interest, artists with very different approaches are included. Roberta Sutherland’s collages form a “messy” counterpoint to Brian Grison’s formal variations. A stunning three-panel painting by Carole Thompson evokes swirling tropical fish with a crisp brilliance. Just around the corner are Sydney Condrashoff’s ardently modern scrawls.

But Gloria Masse’s bales and shades come first. These big oils depict coils of fence wire, hayed hay, leafy nooks and two remarkable monsoon river gods. The two stand like tar-baby scarecrows, planted knee-deep in the shallow water under a huge Calcutta umbrella.

At first glance these paintings depict a frozen photographic moment, each blade of glass captured in time. But their sensual texture, built of a thousand little strokes, draws one in. Come closer to the painting.
Realism dissolves into a colourful calligr-
Let there be light

OH, those spectral visions! For kids it's like a video game. For adults it's a way to be creative without too much effort." So says Paul Winstanley, the rather ecstatic co-producer of Spectral Visions.

The concept is simple enough. Channel sunlight into a darkened room, break it into its component colours with crystals, and manipulate the dazzling rainbows with homemade "light instruments." The effect is a room of mystery and magic, like swimming in a fish tank full of neon tetras.

With partner Eric Pittman, Winstanley has welcomed the public into his laboratory-theatre whenever the sun shone—aull summer long. Their third-floor Unknown Gallery (1012 Douglas Street, 381-5906) is hung with Pittman's light paintings, actually photoprints of spectral phenomena produced without camera or film. Running up through the ceiling is the Industrial Strength Light Bazooka, a sort of periscope which pipes the sunlight down from the roof and fires it onto wax-paper screens. The carpet is littered with mylar cones and gloves encrusted with mirrored mosaics.

When the lights go out the room becomes a spacious darkness, alive with dancing nets of colour. Sinuous light figures swirl in space, blazing ultra violet and magenta. By twisting shiny things the inventors weave a psychedelic firestorm. It would warm the cockles of an acid-tripper's heart.

Paul Winstanley had the idea for the original Spectral Focus while living on Semiahmoo Beach. Spectrafocus is a clever wooden annulus to hold facetted crystals and focus light. He asked Eric Pittman to photograph the invention and soon they were both lost in the colour fields.

They went public almost immediately, at Victoria's Bank Art Project last April. In their room at the top, Pittman and Winstanley learned how to flash plastic and wiggle mirrors in just the right way. They soon moved to The Unknown Gallery and the public has since beat a pathway to their somewhat obscure door.

Daily from noon til sundown the two work out on the Spectral Bazooka and Light Wands. For the historically-minded, there is a camera obscura. Though not electronic, their work is very compatible with video, television programs and live performances at Glendale and Queen Alexandra Hospitals. They dream of a Spectral Solarium in the disused Checkers House atop Beacon Hill for September and October.

Besides patented "light instruments", these modern alchemists envision Home Spectral Visions kits, films, and a bigger place to accommodate the groups that come to see them. "I'd like to get a reflective body suit and dance with the light", says Winstanley. The heady atmosphere of inventors onto a good thing is in the air. It's a bit thrilling, really.

Golden handshake dept.

As of August 31, Alistair MacDuff (Cover Story, Monday, July 22-28) will no longer be the director of the Gallery of the Arctic (611 Fort St.). The owners will amalgamate the shop with their own venture, The Quest for Handcrafts. Barbara Colebrook, MacDuff's knowledgeable assistant of almost eight years, is also leaving. The always dapper MacDuff is unhappy to see the gallery go, but seems delighted to pursue a few of his other interests.

But things won't be the same on Fort Street. It's rare (and pleasant) that a man of his qualifications takes up among us as a shopkeeper, and we'll miss him...

Another one bites the dust. Stones Gallery (1715 Government St.) has closed. The new proprietors are setting up a café on the premises...

And rumour has it that Pat Alexander's Crystal Gardens Gallery (707 Douglas) is about to close. Seems like Kyle's Gallery really started something.

MAX MAYNARD

1940 Moea St, 384-3101, Until July 3

Remember 1978?

The art boom was on. Adulation for Emily Carr was at a peak and her reflected glory shone round about, giving an inflated credibility to artists with historical claims on her. The Emily Carr Gallery on Wharf Street enshrined the tradition; the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria reconsidered its collection of Carr followers, and Max Maynard returned to Victoria.

Maynard was born in 1903, and lived in Victoria from 1912 to 1938, teaching at Lampson Elementary School for the last 12 years. In 1943 he moved east, to Winnipeg, and then to the University of New Hampshire as a professor of English. When he returned to Victoria in 1978 he had again taken up his painting style, almost unchanged from the 1930s, when he was an earnest exponent of "modern art."

A living, producing artist who could be connected with Carr was grat to the mill of the late Kyle’s Gallery. Maynard’s landscape abstractions were in keeping with the Kyle style (near Otonabee, Graham, Jorgensen, Harvey, et al). He was a man in the right place at the right time, and his stature as an artist had never been so high.

Max Maynard, as demonstrated in the current show at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, made stabs at Tom Thomson pointillism, A.J. Jackson rolling hills, and settled into Lawren Harris theosophical geometry as interpreted by Emily Carr in the early 1930s. Generalized art deco woodlands don’t require much drawing. Carr eventually found it lifeless, without soul, and moved on to her juicy riots of colour and life. But Maynard stuck there, with simplified trees which became bare sticks.

There is no reason to designate Maynard — artists are free to do what they like and his work gives a lot of people pleasure.

Rhythmic compositions, a novel colour sense and the use of black-primed paper as a support are pleasing features of his art. But his paintings are no big deal. A look at the work of his local contemporaries — for example, Uhthoff or E.J. Hughes, for example — will convince one that.

Maynard continues to be sold by association. Jack Shadbolt is often mentioned in the same breath — "Maxie and Jackie" feature in Emily Carr’s diaries as frequent visitors, and rather a nuisance. But Shadbolt is a protean spirit, gobbling technique and hurling volcanoes of creative productions on a grand scale and leaving most artists far behind. Maynard’s long suit was persistence in a single style from long ago.

Persistence in a recognizable style is of great advantage in the selling of an artist. But probably Maynard’s great personal charm was an even more invaluable asset. When he died last year surrounded by admirers and patrons, there was no doubt he was headed for the hall of fame which (unfortunately) is reserved for deceased artists. Extensive documentation of his life and work make him a super project for art historians. But, looking at his paintings, I realize that I know a dozen artists in our neighbourhood who can draw and paint better.

Jack Shadbolt referred to Maynard as the translator of our basic land experience into a significant metaphor. I take that to mean that Maynard’s lines and strokes are a coherent language by which he represents the landscape. The catalogue from the Art Gallery turns that around for a show title, "Max Maynard: Landscape as Metaphor." Apparently, every tree can be seen as "a metaphor for man and his spiritual aspirations." Yet, I just can’t see Maynard as a symbolic painter and I think the show is incorrectly titled.

Max Maynard and his drawing Near Lampson St. School; persistence in a single style from long ago.

For years this show has been awaited, to reveal the unknown Max Maynard. After all, Kyle’s, the Provincial Archives, Bau Xi Gallery, and now the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria are lauding Maynard’s accomplishments. But it turns out to be a lot of ballyhoo for a minor talent.

REVIEWER REVIEWED

"Sorry Robert Amon took a personal view of Max Maynard's work at the Art Gallery ("A minor talent," Monday, May 20-26). I thought newspaper reporting was supposed to be more objective. Robert is lucky if he can tell the difference between insignificant content and relevant art. In all my years of living I have not yet developed a completely satisfactory definition of what art really is, even with the help of great writers like Tolstoy. I certainly think it is difficult to judge creative work of any kind. Better, a reporter do what he can to promote a wider public understanding of Canadian culture than voice a personal, negative opinion. Artists in all areas need as much help as they can get.

The oldest of all

The ART Gallery of Greater Victoria has received a gift of two paintings which may fairly claim to be the oldest paintings in any museum in Canada.

One was painted in 670 A.D., the other in 828 A.D. They survived sealed in a cave in China for eight centuries.

The paintings came from the Dunhuang Caves, one of the world’s major archaeological sites. The Dunhuang Caves were a major stopping place for Buddhist travellers going to China along the ancient Silk Route. Located in a desert in the eastern reaches of China, the caves were carved into the sandstone between the 4th and 11th centuries. Today approximately 500 of these caves remain and their extensive walls painted with a number of Buddhist scenes.

In the 11th century the monks who cared for the caves feared invasion and sealed up thousands of scrolls, among them one by the monk Fa Hui. This small work (ink and colour of folded parchment, 26 x 71 cm) is believed to be the oldest painting from these caves now outside China. Although the work of an amateur, it was no doubt saved and stored even then because of its age. It depicts, in an Indian style, two Buddhas and three Bodhisattvas.

The second work is a Buddhist Tantric painting showing Tibetan influence and dating from 828 A.D. It is painted in ink and colours on cloth. Research is still going on to identify the Tantric protector depicted.

The hidden cave came to light only in 1900. Sir Aurel Stein, intrepid explorer and art historian, purchased several thousand paintings and scriptures for a few dollars and placed them in the British and New Delhi museums. Others found their way to the Musée Guimet in Paris. At that time Dr. James Menzies, a Canadian missionary in China, also purchased a few paintings from the caves.

Both the paintings and an interest in Chinese art came to Arthur Menzies, Dr. James Menzies’ son, who was the Canadian ambassador to China from 1976 to 1981. He loaned the paintings to Victoria’s recently exhibited Chinese Paintings in Canadian Collections and while in Victoria donated the paintings to the gallery.

These gifts may be viewed at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria August 11 until October 9 as part of an exhibition of Chinese Art in the Collection.

The tofu invasion

WHAT IS that wobbly white stuff that floats naked in tubs of water in Chinatown? Bean curd? Who wants to eat something called bean curd?
The answer is— lots of people. Only they call it tofu. It is a major source of protein throughout Asia, long a loved and accepted part of the diet of people who are neither health food nuts nor lacking a discriminating palate. Tofu is a puree of soya beans, curded like cheese, and can be eaten raw or cooked a thousand ways.

Ten years ago yogurt was a mystery from Europe and now every secretary and corner store connoisseur has a favourite flavour. What yogurt did to desserts, tofu is now doing to the main course.

They make it in Duncan at Thistledown Soyfoods, where the speciality is tempehburger. They make it at Sooke Soy Foods. And on Denman Island most of the production becomes Frozen Buddha soy "ice cream." Make no mistake— tofu is not just quasi-cutlets for lily-livered hippies— it's food. There are already 200 tofu makers in North America, doing $50 million worth of business a year. In Japan over 50,000 shops make it. And in Victoria, it's a growth industry.

Michael Hsieh didn't need a new trade when he moved here— he was a dentist in Taiwan. But on arrival in Canada he saw a business opportunity too good to miss. And now his Dayspring Soyafoods, at 5-626 Esquimalt St., has taken over the Chinatown market and has their product in most supermarkets. He brought his brother from Kentucky and his parents from the "old country," and installed shiny new boilers from Japan. Now the seven family members make tofu every Monday and Thursday in a production that's like a loving dance. Their output now consumes 240 kg of soybeans a week, but will surely rise to meet the demand for this idea whose time has come.

The mild nutty aroma at the factory is as delectable as fresh bread. Anyone who knows the cuisine of the East knows tofu's place. Soya protein costs only 1/6th as much as meat protein from cows (which we raise on soy beans) and it's good food.

Dayspring also makes soya "milk" from the same beans. "In Taipei," says Hsieh, "there was a kettle of hot soy milk in front of the tofu shop every morning— hot soya milk and a steam bun makes a good breakfast."

Will Canadians ever accept a new food? "At school in Taiwan we had to learn about cow's milk. It was powdered, and sent by the Americans. We mixed it up with hot water and each student had to have a cup full." Hsieh (382-2144) has recipes and a slide show free to interested groups who might want to reverse the milk exchange and try some tofu.

PAINTING WITH IMAGINATION
With some interesting colours and a few time-tested techniques, you can make your home look better than new
By ROBERT AMOS

PAINT UP:
Nothing is as effective in making people take pride in their houses, their streets and their neighbourhoods as paint applied with imagination. It only takes one stunning renovation to make everyone want to "lancy up." Gardening tools appear, windows are cleaned, people again notice millwork and gingertread. Residents emerge as if from caves into the light of day and take a new pride in their homes. Carefully painted buildings bespeak individual creativity and don't attract graffiti. And to those who consider any colour but white or landlady beige an affront to the senses, we remind them that the Greeks painted the Parthenon in colours bright enough to make Zeus blink! One of the principal ingredients of authentic Victorian architecture was a bountiful supply of paint using more colours than Joseph's famous coat.

The war years seem to have dimmed the richness of house trim. Battleship grey paint was all too available and set a style which we are just now shaking off. Scrap metal drives stripped homes of cast iron fences and columns, grace notes only recently finding their way back. Asphalt siding and other insensitive cladding homogenized and brutalized wooden houses, their decorative charm cast aside in favour of heavy armour plating against the elements.

But now new paint technology—tougher films, brighter pigments and easier application and cleanup—have made painting a more satisfying venture. It's the multicolour approach which highlights the special flavour of Victorian homes—to applied with paint what the architect did with wood, and if necessary to pick up where they left off.

People have needed convincing that brighter colours can be used with good taste. At first, painters or designers had to "snack in" a third or fourth colour to accent distinctive shapes. But old photographs will convince even the skeptics that a variety of colours is historically correct and can make a house more handsome. Wooden houses usually have a "body" colour for sides and panels; a contrast for the "architectural elements"—lintels, eaves and edges; a deeper shadow tone to add depth under mouldings; and one or two "punch" colours for dramatic highlights.

For restrained elegance, it's hard to beat the Queen's Printers office at 506 Government St. For years this old mansion was painted the standard government grey. It still has a grey body but the brown "architecture" and black window frames give it a stately elegance appropriate to its vantage. This home was built in 1885 in the Italianate style popular among California's grape growers. It is constructed of California redwood and, because of persistent and careful painting it is as sound as when it was built!

A more striking example of what colour can do is 743 Vancouver at McClure. The body is raspberry, and the details are picked out in a rosy brick tone. More quietly convincing is 721 Vancouver, with pale olive body, ochre trim, taupe architecture, and the fence and shuttles pale red.

The best, though, is around the corner at 1012 Richardson. Bill Murphy, the owner, is likely to be standing out front in his carpenter's apron, considering his next bit of renovation. A redhead, Murphy favours the century-old palette of earth tones for house painting. He has painted his award-winning Victorian home golden ochre with reddish trim. "Next time I'm going to paint the sashes black," he says. That can do for a house what make-up does for a woman—bigger eyes and a touch of formality. Yet some people swear by white mullions, to increase the light inside and the lightness of the outside effect.

Murphy points out he was lucky to find a very patient perfectionist to paint his house, all with a brush. "He was into tai chi, and he'd come back from his class at the Y, very relaxed and ready to work." When Murphy remodeled the Brewer house at Fernwood and Johnson, his painter washed the whole house with a cloth and some cleanser first. That house had been covered with asphalt siding for years, but now it's back to wood and colours.

Sometimes a design-minded painter will prepare a coloured sketch of a house. More often, the primer goes on, an unobtrusive part of the building will be painted so that the owner can judge the colours against one another, and see the effect in its environment. The roof colour, landscapeing, and neighbours must be taken into consideration. Colour can alter our perceptions. Dark-coloured houses seem smaller than light ones, cool colours recede more than warm ones. By judicious placement of painted details, the horizontals or verticals of a house can be emphasized.

To maintain a house's market value and as a gesture towards neighbourhood spirit, it's good to keep a house painted. But the main reason is preservation of the house. "Save the surface and save all," says the paint manufacturer. The paint film is the only thing between the wood and the weather.

A house generally has a primer and two top coats. The paint
"...there away a bit every year.
The surface should be weathered and cleaned of mildew, joints are caulked, window putty repaired, protruding nails replaced with larger ones and sealed. Bare wood should be treated with a preservative and primed, Shiny spots of paint must be sanded.
Preparation is a long job, but the paint's surface is only as good as what's underneath.

But what sort of paint is best?
Oil-based paints are made from natural or synthetic resins, pigment and white spirits. Synthetic resins may be added—allyld for flexibility or polyurethane for toughness. Oil-based paints are absorbed slightly into the wood, unlike latex which forms a surface film.

Emulsion paints, usually called latex, are a modern miracle. They are made with synthetic resins and colour suspended in water. When the water evaporates a resilient film is left on the wood. The colours last longer, the cleanup is easier, and drying time is quicker. With latex, as with all paints, it is important not to spread it too thin.

Weakening the paint film is no advantage at all.

Trim paint is extra-durable, washable paint for high-use areas, for example around doorways. The surface of a house takes on beating from the weather; the window sills and fewer potted edges on the south-facing windows of a house. The tough waterproof film, glossy oil trim paint is a big advantage and should not be ignored, even if the body of the house is covered with latex.

These days, nylon or other synthetic materials for paint brushes are universally accepted by all house painters. The brush will give a lifetime of service if washed up properly. For oil-based paints, wipe the excess on a newspaper, then soak the brush in solvent. With washing, then mix up a solution of dishwashing soap and water and work it into the brush. The solvent breaks down the paint, and the soap disperses the solvent.
In the end the brush can be rinsed with water and hung up to dry.

Every painter invents tricks to help him get through the two or three week task of painting a house. Here are a few of the best cones.

• Paint roller cleanup will be a lot easier if the paint tray is put inside a plastic bag before use.
When finished throw the bag away.

• If the paint covers a few millimeters at the edge of a window, an air-tight seal will be formed.

• When using masking tape to protect windows and fixtures, remove the tape as soon as the paint sets, or in sunlight, immediately after painting.

• To prevent the salt from stick­ing, move the window frequently while it is drying, and do not close it.

Those with a well-organized life might consider the "one-side-a-year" approach. Start with a well-painted house. After four or five years paint the south side. Next year paint the west, then east, then north. Take a year two off and start again. Painting one side of a house is a fairly tolerable amount, not enough to form a man against painting.

The best way to find a good painter? Ask your friends. It takes a few years to find out how good the paint job weathered.
The price can vary greatly, but usually you get what you pay for—all paint jobs are not created equal.

Then again, you could call up some friends and get a few quotes of beer....
Carol Davidson in her whimsy:
“technically, it’s a folly”

An illusion. This small glass room seems larger than all the rest of her apartment. The plate glass roof is a kaleidoscope of reflections. The extra light, views and solar heat collecting are added treats. The fantasy evident in her whimsy is an important part of all Davidson’s designs, expanding the actual size of a space by inviting the imagination to wander.

Davidson can treat architecture as a plaything because she is not an architect. Like many Victorians, she is “an amateur everything.” A former student of St. Margaret’s and Norfolk House, she later worked as a computer consultant, then ran a small farm. Her enthusiasm led her to study orchard management, fish farming, and woodlots; then a herb store, cooking school, “and all the time I was doodling house designs.” It took her a long time to settle on that as her major interest. Now, at 41, though not accredited, she is in demand as an amateur architect and designer.

As Davidson looks out over Victoria she dreams of space, salvage and renovation. She knows that she is not alone in her plans for Victoria, but is eager to realize “old folks residences on the second floor of empty buildings downtown; a new paint job for the whole of Mason Street; a pedestrian passageway in the 500 block between Johnson and Yates Streets,” and a lot more. The opening party for the whimsy was a popular gathering with the tastemakers, for they recognized in its construction the genuine Victoria spirit—imagination, a bit of reverence for the past, and construction with care.

GALLERIE UNTITLED
1618 Government Street (phone out of service)

The art shows change and change, and the art galleries remain—with a little bit of luck. A year ago K.C. Tebbutt opened his Gallerie Untitled and it's still there. In Victoria, it is the home of spiritual values in art. Tebbutt isn't big on realism, or sales. The works exhibited tend toward an organic abstraction which depends on the beholder's long patience to see and appreciate.

K.C. Tebbutt is just a young fellow. He's the one in the three-piece suit, Birkenstock sandals and the asymmetrical haircut. His own paintings made a strong debut a few years ago—swirling phantasmsagoria in which infinitely tiny brush strokes of amoebic doodle merge with cataclysmic paint texture to create images: inviting quasi-mystical contemplation. These grew from the teaching of Jack Wise at the Victoria College of Art and through the influence of Chin-Shek, legendary astrologer-calligrapher-painter now living in Edmonton. They are garnished with a catholic interest in the mysteries of the East. But Tebbutt has now become an enthusiastic aesthetic entrepreneur.

A gallery representing transcendent values—there's a task that needed doing. There has long been a mystical bent in the art of the Pacific Northwest. It can be identified by a preoccupation with calligraphic line, the integrity of each brush stroke. Mark Tobey, some of whose work just finished shown at the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria, was the great white father of the trend. The “light swooping through” Emily Carr's paintings partakes of the same spirit.

Tebbutt's gallery offers a sympathetic scene to people with a touch of genius who fit nowhere else, a whole segment of the bizarre and driven.

For example, during 1982, Norval Morrisseau dwelt among us. He is the founder of the Woodland school of art, the Ojibway traditions of northern Ontario set down in acrylic paint on canvas. His history as an artist has hit the high points—a lavish coffee table book, government collections, huge revenues from reproductions on collectors plates and so on. He has a biography of mysterious disappearances, alcoholism, Eckankar, sex and drugs—the whole thing. And, to top it off, he is a shaman, an authentic timeless messenger of the gods. He paints with a blazing directness that gives no quarter, speaks to everyman, and has the power to transform the beholder and short-circuit the senses. There's no telling why he ended up here—except that Victoria's psychic energy drew him west. His work is on show at Canadian Impressions on our tourist strip, but somehow it doesn't work there. But Tebbutt's place is perfect. I don't know if anyone made any money on Morrisseau's show there in December. But there is an audience here that needs to see these things, and Tebbutt is serving it.

Sure, there are shortcomings to Gallerie Untitled. The publicity is brash, sensational and full of spelling mistakes. The gallery walls are rough and dirty. The framing is sometimes pretentious, running to virtuoso mat-cutting in half a dozen colours. The business angles look tricky, running to pyramid sales (bring in two purchasers and get a free painting) and free coupons. The exhibits are too big and often tediously uniform. For example, Charles Brookman's work seemed like a huge dose of navel-gazing. Linda Cayer's current exhibit is more appealing but it's hard to tell one drawing from another.

Yet Tebbutt keeps on actively serving a need. He likes to be open “after hours.” Two nights running Queen Ida partied there till dawn after her zydeco stomp next door at the OAP Hall. Looking at paintings, rapping about the spiritual side of art, printing, photography and picture framing are what it's all about. Tebbutt has something going that doesn't fit the formula. Neither slick nor government subsidized, it's Untitled. And it's still there.

WORST FEARS CONFIRMED

I’m writing in regard to the review of Gallerie Untitled (Monday, March 25-31) in which I feel Mr. Amos missed some valid points concerning art and intellectualism, and confused some simple issues with some very big, useless

...galleries, unless otherwise funded, depend on sales to keep themselves open. Now, if K.C. Tebbutt is more concerned with spiritual values in art rather than realism and sales, why on earth would he revert to “brash, sensational” publicity, “pyramid sales” and “free coupons” to keep his operation running? Secondly, I don’t understand what “quasi-mystical contemplation” is. Contemplation, on any level, is a mystical thing; this in reaction to Mr. Tebbutt’s own work only tells me that his work must be pretty confusing to look at.

Art, that is, art that works, is an intense representation of an artist’s personal spirituality. It would be foolish to think that Victoria’s artists are any more spiritual than the artists of any other community. That is to say, who can say that Jack Wise’s paintings are more intensely spiritual than the paintings of Raphael or Monet, merely because Jack Wise is modern and Victorian? You can’t.

It doesn’t need pretentious pseudo-new-wave backdrops to support it. It does not emerge from the world of the bizarre and driven, from the eccentricities of a small community who may, or may not, believe that they are a demi-monde of New York or San Francisco. There are a lot of talented artists in Victoria, who, because of a lack of adequate financing, may never be seen in a gallery. Their work is quietly passed over while those few “with a touch of genius,” the right amount of money, and something abstract enough, will be more than visible to the great delight of the pseudo-intellectual crowd, who seem to feel it their duty to praise Victorian art whether it be good or bad.

The Gallerie Untitled set an important goal in Victoria when it first opened, that of making Victoria aware of the vitality and important energy reflected in its art; but to pretend that Victoria is an artistic mecca or a trend setter when it is more and more obvious that a great deal of our “pop” culture comes to us from California and eastern Canada and the U.S., to pretend that is to deceive ourselves. Robert Amos has not convinced me that the Gallerie Untitled represents “transcendent values;” rather, through his verbosity, he has confirmed some of my worst fears— that art is becoming not so much a “Harrod’s” as it is becoming a “Shopper’s Drug Mart;” that commercialism is becoming more important than sincerity.

Leaven is like unto a Mustard Seed

The Mustard Seed Church (550 Pandora, 385-0512) is founded on a text you just can’t ignore.

“I was hungry and you gave me food, I was thirsty and you gave me drink, I was a stranger and you welcomed me... as you did it to one of the least of these my brethren, you did it to me.”

(Matthew 25:35-40)

Gipp Forster: streetwise and committed

This Church is located way downtown and has a reputation as the church of the rejected — hookers, junkies, ex-cons and street people of all sorts. “Jesus was a street person,” says Gipp Forster, founder and pastor. “He was the one who said ‘the fox has his lair, and the birds have their nests, but the son of man has nowhere to lay his head’.” But there is the Mustard Seed. As Forster puts it, “This is not a mission. We’re a street church, belonging to the street people. They run it. It’s theirs.”

The Mustard Seed has weathered eight stormy years in Victoria, first on Government Street, then in its storefront on Pandora. Forster himself is street-wise and thrives on the challenge of ministering to those who need it. “If everything’s going right, you better start wondering why. If you’re gonna start Christ’s outreach in the centre of the enemy camp, do you expect them to leave you alone?”

Forster was himself taken off the streets by an Anglican priest. “I had holes in my shoes, knives strapped to my legs. I was an altar boy for three years. And yet in those three years I never came to Christ. I was given His name but I never knew Him as a friend.” He took the attitude that churches were full hypocrites, but one day met a minister who told him “If that’s so, come on in — there’s always room for one more.”

Forster was preening his ego, writing poetry and recording his songs at the time. But he gave it up and started a church. “We must give up ceremony for service, fear for faith, guilt for grace.” And so he did. This year he will be ordained as a Baptist minister. The credentials committee will ignore his lack of seminary training, to recognize endless field work. He gives the credit to the Mustard Seed Church. And to Jesus.

Today’s message is the Food Bank. “Gorde Hunter of the Times-Colonist came up with the idea. If just every person who could would come up with one food item per week...” Since Christmas, drop boxes have appeared in every grocery store and many public places. The initial response was great, but apathy has set in. It’s time for a new awakening.

Forster is quick to point out, “We didn’t start the Food Bank. God started it... You look at the churches in this town, their sanctuaries are sitting (empty) and empty. Ours is going back and forth with food all day long. God called for it in a little tiny, dingy place. He could have called it any place He wanted it. Yet our God is humble. It’s humbling for someone to come and ask for food. And it’s humbling for us to give it.” Since Christmas, 5,000 people have been fed. Now stocks are very low. Are there any among us who can spare a loaf or a fish?

LOOK OUT, Victoria—here come the sixties. On Saturday, March 19, Open Space is playing hostess to two of Andy Warhol’s early films and one of their stars. In 1963 Warhol shook the world awake with his six-hour film Sleep, soon followed by Empire, an eight-hour portrait of the Empire State Building. With his friends at The Factory, his New York studio, Warhol produced Vinyl in 1965.

Vinyl was the first film version of Anthony Burgess’ novel A Clockwork Orange. Critic Stephen Koch had this to say:

“For all its fist-fights, arm-twisting, grovelling, whining, sneering; for all its he-men pilloried and tortured, Vinyl is silly, with a look of farcical cornball amateurism. The actors—very visibly reading their lines from idiot sheets out of frame—are hardly able to get the words right, let alone believe what they are being made to say.”

Loves of Ondine was originally part of *, a 25-hour film with two projectors showing different images simultaneously on the same screen. This in turn was part of the Exploding Plastic Inevitable, a total sensory circus which also included Lou Reed and The Velvet Underground. Inevitably it exploded into its component parts, now presented for our more mature and serious consideration.

Ondine says he started out dramatic:

“They kept my scholarship back in high school because I was caught in the men’s room teaching some black boys to cha-cha.” Warhol gave him a platform: “I sold my soul to the camera. I have a feeling I was sent in there ’cause they knew I was going to explode.” And explode he did, high on methedrine and playing the role of the Pope.

Warhol does not distribute the early films but he gave Ondine prints of Vinyl and Loves of Ondine. “I keep wondering why he pulled the films out of distribution and then allowed me to go around with them... another thought keeps popping into my brain. He’s forcing me to watch my performance.”

So, if you were doing something else when the sixties went by, or if you want to check out your opinions of Warhol, melted by hindsight, turn out for Ondine, on celluloid in Vinyl and in the flesh.

Taking his cue

FROM GIBSON'S Pool Hall in Victoria to the World Professional Snooker Championships—that's the path Cliff Thorburn has followed. Thorburn, 34, is now based in Toronto. Fresh from his £16,000 victory at the Benson and Hedges Masters Snooker Tournament at Wembley, England, he performed an exhibition match and trick shot demonstration at the UVic Auditorium on Feb. 24, sponsored by the Firemen's Mutual Benefit Society. The exhibition raised a handsome amount for the burn unit at Victoria's new hospital.

Years ago, when Thorburn finally beat local hot shot Ernie Jay, he dropped out of Vic High and headed east to pursue his serious interest in the "gentlemen's game". Snooker is played on a large, 6' x 12' table and is more strategically complex than billiards or pool. Thorburn hadn't the "hustler" mentality necessary to fleece the rubes in Toronto and so he became a snooker pro there, training young talent.

In Britain, snooker is almost as big as soccer. When Thorburn won the World Championships in 1980 he was the first non-British player ever to do so. He then took up residence in England and got on the trail as an exhibition pro. As a measure of his fame, in Britain he is recognized on the street wherever he goes. But the travelling, and homesickness too, weakened his game and he returned to Toronto to work with teammates and polish his style. With one of his young proteges, Kirk Stevens, and Bill Werbeniuk, he captured the World Team Championship in 1982.

Jim Wych of Calgary, former Canadian amateur champion, was brought in to play Thorburn in the exhibition match and downed him three games to two. A good crowd packed the balconies at University Centre to watch this unusual event, a blend of cue skill and stage presence. It concluded with a display of trick shots—the machine gun, the chopsticks, walking the cueball and shooting the black ball from a volunteer's mouth.

Of course there is talk of doing this again next year. But Victoria's Peacock Billiards in the past week has sold a 5' x 10' table to lawyer Chris Considine and received another commission to hand-craft an oak and rosewood model nine feet long. Perhaps next time Thorburn comes "home," we'll have some competition for him.

Victoria is often alive with the sound of bells. Among the most noticeable are those of Christ Church, the Anglican Cathedral on Quadra Street, the only ones which still ring in the traditional way. Soon two new bells will be added to the eight which ring forth from the north tower, though the church still needs to find the money to hang them.

The new bells are relatively small, as bells go, weighing in at 316 and 294 kilograms, and will add two higher notes to the octave of D flat already present. The bells were cast in Britain at a cost of about $6,000 and have arrived at the Cathedral, where they await installation. Ker Priestman and Associates of Victoria have donated their services to alter and redesign the bell frame, but the installation is expected to be expensive. The bells were purchased using money raised from private donations, but the Cathedral still must raise additional funds to hang the bells.

On March 8 Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth and Philip, The Duke of Edinburgh will attend their dedication, to be conducted by the Bishop, Rt. Rev. Hywel Jones. The larger of the two bells is marked “God Bless Prince William. Pax Nobiscum” to commemorate the birth of the new prince, second in line to the throne.

The smaller bell is a memorial to Edward “Pop” Izard, the Master Ringer at the Cathedral from the time of the hanging of the original bells until his death in 1978. “The original bells were hung courtesy of Yarrow’s shipyard. The manager, Pops Izard, was an old country bell-ringer and many of the band worked in the shipyard in the old days,” said one of the current ringers. Izard’s son Arthur is currently Tower Captain.

The eight bells already in use were a gift in 1935, the Silver Jubilee Year of King George V. They are replicas of those in Westminster Abbey. The largest, a tenor, is 42 metres in diameter and weighs 1,300 kg. The bells swing on large wheels and are rung by hand. They don’t play hymn tunes, but on the dedication a quarter peal of 1,260 changes will be rung. (A “peal” is a program of chords or “changes” which takes about 4 hours to ring, so the quarter peal will take all 50 minutes.)

Art Gallery of Greater Victoria,
1040 Moss St., 384-4101, until Feb. 3

ANY EXHIBITION with the title B.C. Women Artists: 100 Years is by definition a Herculean labour and a thankless task.

For starters, curator Nicholas Tuele compiled a list of some 700 women of British Columbia who were or are artists. For the exhibit, he managed to fit in work by only 60 of them—so somebody’s going to feel left out. Choosing all of British Columbia as his field made it impossible to really give fair representation. Perhaps he should have concentrated on Victoria’s women.

With only a short time to gather the show, and the perennially inadequate budget, the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria’s current “gender show” has the expected shortcomings. However, it does include some lovely pictures, and many features of the total package are commendable.

Accompanying the show is a super video tape produced by Tuele and Verna Hall. Gentle music without intrusive narration introduces about a dozen artists—including Sybil Andrews, Carole Sabiston, and Gathie Falk—who have their say as they stand in their studios. Excellent camerawork weaves a tapestry from the painters’ disparate images and often the paintings look better in video than in real life. A poster featuring a reproduction of a stunning painting by Margaret Peterson is a real bargain at $4.95.

This show sheds light on a number of artists due for a retrospective look: Madame de L’Aubiniere, Statira Frame and Molly Bobak, to name a few. One comes across isolated moments of real beauty, such as Elza Mayhew’s sensuous bronze Sphinx, but there is no thematic “glue.”

"If it's for a potlatch then it's really got to be finished - rigging and all. I'm working on this piece for the museum's collection, so I can take as long as I like. For that pole entering in the corner the money wasn't there so I didn't finish it up too much." In another case, Ron Hamilton, who also uses the name Kwuykapah, has decided that his production of ceremonial items will only be for those who are themselves part of the tradition. For the marketplace, he makes another. These shifting values are not a new thing. Two masks of the Craft Bed of Heaven illustrate the point. One was Willie Seaweed's family treasure, which he sold to the museum many years ago. The other one in the show he carved to replace it. He came to the museum later. Selling the mask doesn't mean selling the prerequisite of using it as an exclusive family totem. If the money is appealing, the artist may be happy to sell it - he can always make another. Next to these masks is a small totem pole, obviously a copy, but Mungo Martin's work just the same. Is one more valid than the others? The Legacy clearly reveals the beauty in each. London's Sunday Times reviewer felt the tone of the exhibit to be "preachy and sanctimonious" and wond ered if you can "preserve the cultures of the past without sterilizing them." This exhibit, more than many others, tries to preserve a culture in a number of ways. You can preserve a culture by educating - hence the "preachy" tone. You can preserve it by its best workers, through commissions and exposure to new markets. You can preserve it by inviting the artists and practitioners to take a leading role, to demonstrate, lecture, perform and answer questions. You can honour a culture and enhance its pride. The Provincial Museum and the Newcombe Auditorium program are making great efforts to "preserve without sterilizing." This is our chance to share in the process.

The wonderful world of Edna Brown

The 1300 block on Government Street sees a lot of action on a good night. Cruisers in Chrysler's flow by the hookers who wait at the edge of the stream. Someone leans on every lamppost.

Just out of the hurly-burly nightscape at Government and Johnson is a haven— not the picnic table democracy of Little Sam's burger shop or the subterranean lurv of Pali's, disco for the gay crowd. It will never attract the swaggering backroom suttering down the sidewalk from the Century Pub. In fact, it's hard to picture the clients of this world of manners and decorum sharing the sidewalk with the rest of the crowd. It's called Edna Brown's Little Dinner Theatre. Built in 1909 as a stickleadoon, for the past three years it has been the home of Victoria's one and only dinner theatre.

Step into the spacious foyer, past the protective sculpture of the baby Hermes (guardian of travellers) and make yourself at home on the generous brocade sofa. Check your hemline and collars in the mirrors and catch your breath while your date makes the arrangements and the maids statues finish their greetings— owls and fisherfolk and a plaster llama sitting on the carpet. Prized souvenirs of past performances warn visitors that this is going to be something very different. "Did you know? Edna Brown, an imaginative restauranteur, changed the history of dinner theatre one afternoon?"

Suddenly Edna Brown pops out of the kitchen to greet her guests. She is simply dressed, a small woman, 72 years old, who moves with restraint and sureness. She proudly welcomes you to her theatre, her home. She describes the ballet, the lights, the tables and the menu. She's a talker, a charmer. She's a good talker, she's a good charmer. She's a good charmer.

The theatre is just a few steps away, back past the bar. Everyone gapes at first sight. It's breathtaking, a tiny room (only six metres wide) like a jewel-box, decorated like a dream. It's very clean, finished to perfection with the best materials: full wallpaper, red lights set into the tables and magnified through glowing waterglasses. A mirrored staircase leads to a small balcony at the back. The tiny canopied stage promises wonders behind a ruffled curtain while love seats line up facing the stage—a gracious, gentled red velvet tunnel of love.

The audience sits entranced, taking in every detail—sparkling ceiling, designer curlicue, and the Aynsley bone china (service for 90!) in a Chinoiserie pattern of birds and flowers dating from the 18th Century. "I don't wear jewellery," says Edna Brown, "but I like nice china."

In 1980 she bought the building at 1323 Government Street. Her previous restaurant was the Red Swing, which Howie Siegel turned into Pagliacci's, hardly believing the Royal Doulton china dinner service he inherited. He also fell heir to a two-metre mannequin in a red velvet dress which used to swing there, from a papier mache tree, beneath fibreglass clouds. The decor was all dark drapes and mirrors, even the 16-foot front window. Edna Brown also ran The Sugar'D Mule (a euphemism for Sweet Ass) in the Chateau Victoria Hotel from 1975 to 1980.

Edna Brown does the cooking herself, calling on a long career of cooking at Jasper Park Lodge, Banff Springs Hotel and, back in the early '50s, Vancouver's Masconibo Club (where Yvonne de Carlo got her start).

The meals are usually satisfactory and often include some extra-special feature like homemade blackberry conserves on the chocolate cake with whipping cream. Anyone who thinks the meals are less than extravagant should know that what she saves on the meals she spends on the actors.

Edna's dinner theatre project is the realization of a dream. Without government grants or sponsorship she runs a full-time theatre that will hire and expose young, untitled actors. As one of them said, "I'm the only 16-year-old actor in town with a paying job." Many local directors and playwrights, among them Phil Wagner and Kevin Land, have been given a chance here at a time when it really counted. Said one: "I hope she never quits. With all the difficulties inherent in making this thing a go she has the courage and determination. She's producing theatre. It's totally new, all original."

The curtain rises, slowly, into the sky blue canopy, like Diamond Lil, raising her fullsome ruffled skirt pleat by pleat.

The curtain rises, slowly, into the sky blue canopy, like Diamond Lil, raising her fullsome ruffled skirt pleat by pleat. Tonight's play in The Vicar's Daughter, one of Edna Brown's romantic suspense comedies. ("I got so mad at paying royalties that I started writing my own plays," she explained.)

The greedy vicar leaves his oversexed teenage daughter Helga, and his oversexed garlic-and-onions wife for a "pleasant and profitable summer" with his flock. He leaves them in the care of Peter, a newspaper reporter, who promises to cure Helga of her problem—streaking nude through the house. As soon as the vicar is gone, Peter convenes a meeting of three members of the Association for Homeless Newspaper Reporters. Add an unsolved murder and the appearance of Benny, "a dangerous paranoic with homicidal tendencies" and you've got something for everybody.

Edna Brown's talents as an author rest partly on the ruthless efficiency with which she manipulates sex and suspense. As the play pours along in a stream of consciousness, the characters take sleeping pills or poison without a thought, dropping dead on stage left, right and centre. The effect verges on surrealism.

Edna Brown has written many plays and to date has staged Love and Lies, Breaking Out, The Vicar's Daughter and is now producing Noah in the Linn's Des, a two and a half hour musical which reputedly will be completely based on hymn tunes. She says they're all available on video, and that some have been staged in other cities, and are being prepared for passenger nights on a coastal cruise line.

It has been said of Edna Brown that "she feeds you and then she talks to you." What does she say in the plays? "I wouldn't believe a damn thing I read in the newspapers now. What a way to make a living—writing about dead nude girls. I'd rather write about live nude girls."

"Dora was a girl of a heart of gold. She didn't realize you had to sell sex."

Edna Brown speaks bluntly. She is proud to consider herself a rebel, a bit of a nut. One of her characteristics is a love of younger people; she surrounds herself with youth and it pays off. The Vicar's Daughter went through four directors in a few weeks and then it was left up to the young actors, whose dedication and intensity never let up. Peter, the pivotal role, is played by 16-year-old Dominic Lawless. The calm of his remarkable performance holds the cast together on stage. All the other characters are morally reprehensible but somehow endearing. Helga, played by a scrumptious 17-year-old (Cathie Whitney), fights off a repressed nymphomaniac that allows for no character development but keeps the audience transfixed.

Occasionally Edna Brown will appear at the back of the theatre. She's been known to bang the pots loudly in the kitchen if she isn't pleased with the performance, just one of the ways she controls every aspect of her creation and keeps her staff in fear of her impulsive decisions. She sometimes hire and fires on the spot, though some loyal employees have become like family members. "Benny" writes his own parts in the play—here's a fixture. Her regular audience may be uncultivated theatrically, but they are loyal. They exit smiling, and send postcards from all over the world—"a unique experience, so enjoyable." When the mood is right they gather afterwards in the banquet room downstairs to sing and linger beside the palm-tree mural.

And when they go home, the creator, her pacemaker working overtime, keeps going until 3 am. She's back up at 7 am. Her vigorous constitution is sustained without medicines. "I let my ideas out—I don't get head aches." Besides painting and playwriting, she's working on her autobiography, where the truth about her teenage homemaking days in Manitoba may finally be told. She's a veracious collector of antiques, the best of which are in her penthouse apartment upstairs.

She's sincere, tough, and protective, but without ever losing a lovable streak of zaniness. In her new, Little Linn's Dinner Theatre is not for everyone. It will only work on those susceptible to the magic of manners, decorum and the tastes of a 72-year-old lady, and not just any 72-year-old lady.

GREAT ENTRANCES—A PICTORIAL ESSAY

SEWERCIDE THE GANGES SEWER DILEMMA—PART 2

OUR LADY OF THE HARBOUR
On the occasion of her 75th birthday
AT THE TURN OF THE CENTURY, VICTORIA LACKED AN IMPORTANT link to connect it with the mainland and exploit its "Kingpin" location in the Pacific Northwest. The CPR built a ferry fleet to service the triangle route—Vancouver, Seattle and Victoria—and to sail each leg in both directions every day. The Empress Hotel was part of the plan.

The Indians remembered being able to paddle from Ross Bay to the Inner Harbour via James Bay, the site for the Empress. Named for Governor James Douglas, the bay was a stinking tidal flat, a convenient dumping ground just down the street from the fort.

Captain J.W. Troup and S.H. Barnard came up with the idea of landfill and a hotel. While Troup went to talk the CPR into the Triangle Route Ferries, in 1903 Barnard became mayor and arranged concessions for the hotel scheme. In return for freedom from taxes and water rates for 15 years, the CPR would build a hotel worth at least $300,000. The first stage of construction cost $1,600,000 and in the end a lot more than that was put into what had been James Bay.

Horse-drawn wagons brought fill to the site throughout 1904. "Even in those days they were labours round the clock under what passed for floodlights," says Howard Hemmings, officially chief engineer of the Empress. "Sails and bales of straw were dumped into the morass to give some sort of footing for the workmen, while pole drivers thumped day and night driving 125-foot piles as close together as possible until they reached bedrock." Eventually there were 2,853 timber piles, as long as the Empress is tall.

The choice of architect was obvious—Francis Rattenbury. "Rat" had built the Parliament Buildings almost next door. On Government Street he'd done the Bank of Montreal in the CPR's favourite style, Victorian Chateauesque. And he'd already worked for the CPR, building two successive railway depots on Government St. The design Rattenbury came up with was nothing if not electric. The overall emphasis is vertical, flat wall surfaces relieved by a picturesque broken roofline. The details are concentrated on this roof architecture, including neo-gothic dormers, dormer arches, and domed polygonal turrets which reflect similar motifs in the Parliament Buildings.

Does the tide rise in the sub-basement of the Empress? Not really, though the piles are kept damp at all times. Seeping fresh water preserves them. The entire edifice rests on huge concrete pyramids which stand on clusters of pilings. Under the waters of James Bay, 1903: $1.6 million later, the Empress was built.

Porte Cochere, a cavernous room with seven-metre high ceilings was created. The earth removed lightened the load which could cause the landfill to sink on the 10%'th acre site.

When the central section of the hotel opened in January 21, 1908 there were 180 rooms. Nobody seemed to mind the gravel roadways and plank sidewalks. Of course the fill had to settle before the paving was done. On entering the Porte Cochere "the visitor finds himself in a magnificent oak-panelled hall, patterned after the baronial halls of the great mansions of England," boasts an account of the opening of this wonderful edifice. "Carved oak panelling extends up the walls to a height of almost 10 feet; the ceiling done in yellow is very heavily beamed with oak timbers relieved at either end by small medallions representing the beaver, the lion, the crown and the thistle... the whole effect being one of artistic strength coupled with solid worth."

remains as it always has been. The front desk is much the same. What is now the Library Bar was at first a ladies' parlour. In those days it was unduly like for a lady without an escort to sit in the Roundas. There was no mistaking the feminine charm of this Elizabethan room. The handsome fitted rugs had been specially woven in pinks and greys to match the handpainted floral songs on walls and furniture. Later it became an antique shop and the hotel's gift shop and finally the Library Bar. It is fortunate that through-out various rearrangements it retained its ornate plasterwork ceiling, justly considered a masterpiece.

Of course, most people whizzed past the ladies' parlour, past the brass cage elevators, to the Rotunda or lounging room. That "potted palm jungle" was a veritable hub of the universe. Victoria was a point at which many touring passengers sought to spend a few days, to break up a trip around the world. The British India of Kipling and the hill stations beckoned. The Himalayas are not entirely dissimilar to the Olympics. Edward Backhouse, the famous Hermit of Peking, fled to the Empress Hotel when the Forbidden City was in an uproar. The prevalence of Australian materials and Victoria's place on the British "All Red Route" marked the Empress as a nodal point in the Empire—like the Oriental in Bangkok or Raffles Hotel in Singapore, the Empress was a grand British outpost.

The atmosphere of the Rotunda (as the Lobby was then called) must have been quite rich. Perfume and cigar smoke, spitoons, and staff in uniforms added to the bustle around Wicker chairs and a domed ceiling in the Palm Court: before the snowstorm.

The whole concept must have been very pleasing. Pasing from the busy hotel lobby, one was attracted to the light and sound of falling water in the conservatory. There was a Moorish tiled fountain in a glass room. On the way was the Palm Court, a tea room under a splendid glass dome. Six metre palms sheltered those sitting out a dance on spindly-legged, wrought iron chairs amid exotic flowering plants. The circular ceiling acted as a sort of sounding board that magnified the lowest whisper and betrayed untold confidences. Inscriptions of wine and witty sayings from well-known authors were written in white on the green panels of the walls, and an aquarium completed the tropic and tranquil decor. The domed glass skylight fell in during a thaw which followed a snow storm in the winter of 1968 and was not replaced. Opening off the tea room was the magnificent Crystal Ballroom, added in 1912. It had an arched, glazed roof and deep windows on three sides. Devotees of the terpsichore could staregaze as they whirled about the floor. The ceiling is still glass but, now painted blue, it has the hotel's air conditioning installed above.

Dinner at the Empress was the ultimate way to celebrate a wedding anniversary in Victoria. The dining room is large and seems unchanged. The effect of solid walnut is supported by massive beams and pillars of Australian rosewood, entirely carved and glowing a rich, roast beef brown. The floor is Austrian red beam.
The Forte Cocktails: "artistic strength coupled with solid wealth".

The Empress, one of the most prestigious hotels in Victoria, has a long and fascinating history. In the early 1920s, the hotel, then known as the Hotel de Ville, was the scene of numerous events and celebrations. The first Empress Ball was held in 1928, and it was followed by annual Bonfire, Christmas, and New Year's Balls. The hotel was also the venue for the legendary Coffee Palace, which was famous for its high tea. The Empress was also a favorite among royalty, with King George V and Queen Mary visiting in 1932.

The hotel was renovated in the 1980s, with a $4 million project to improve its facilities. The Empress has been a symbol of Victoria's social life for over 100 years and continues to attract tourists who love its history and charm.

The hotel's ghosts are also a popular attraction, with guests claiming to hear the sounds of footsteps and see the occasional shadow. The Empress is a must-visit destination for anyone interested in Victoria's history and culture.

This is MacDuff, who the National Museum of Man retained to assemble their collection of Inuit carving. Since 1967 collectors from all over the world have made their way to his Gallery of the Arctic at 611 Fort Street to buy carvings from this rare and authentic source. The tupilaks can become more specific. One of the Eskimo carvers is noted for his ability to transform the tupilak into a double-tongued creature. "The hunter in question is paddling along in his kayak, the spirit of the tupilak is under the water and gets out of the way of the hunter. The tupilak is a legacy of the Eskimo people. They have connotations that one would consider to be a sacred thing. The tupilak is a legacy of the Eskimo people. They have connotations that one would consider to be a sacred thing.

POLAR VODOO

When he's not in his gallery, Alistair MacDuff is stamping the Arctic for carved whales' teeth that have the power to drown people. And he will spend a long time working on the tupilak, thinking about this person. He will talk to the carving, confer his ideas to it, and infuse it with his passion, hatred and fear. He might say "I have done nothing against this man and it is choosing to threaten me. I want you to kill him." If the enemy is a coastal hunter, then on the sea in his kayak hunting seal, he might say: "I am going to give you a seal brain and a sub-human brain as well. You have everything you need. Get him off my back. I want him out of my life."

"The hunter in question is paddling along in his kayak and suddenly he sees a turbulence on the starboard quarter. Because he has been hunting all his life he knows it is not a fish, not a seal, not a walrus, not a whale. And he gets a little suspicious. Now the turbulence is off his port beam and he ignores it. But after a while it comes up again—nothing there, just turbulence on the water. And finally he gets angry and frustrated and because he's a hunter he unleashes his harpoon. And then... (he suddenly hurl an imaginary harpoon out toward the shoppers on Fort Street) the spirit of the tupilak is under the water and gets out of the way of the harpoon and catches the line and pulls the hunter in and drowns him."

There's a problem with this manner of settling accounts. If the victim happens to be a hunter of very strong character and very difficult to scare, he realizes that after some time that a tupilak has been set against him. He notices that he is doing stupid things, things that he knows better than to do. All his life he has been driving his dogs wherever he would be safe. One morning he sees something that interests him and he turns his team and he goes over the ice that's got water on it—he knows it's strong. But in this case it is not and he goes through. He thinks, "What have I done? I should have recognized the signs." And then, seeing a pter­migan on a rock, he takes an arrow and shoots, hitting the rock. The arrow ricochets back and narrowly misses him. He wonders, "What's happening here?" and he declares to his inmost self, "I am not afraid of you. I am stronger than the man who made you. Go back and kill him."

To the islands off Angmassalik it's 75 or 100 miles and it takes a number of hours. Tupilaks are also obtainable at Julianehaab, Sondre Stromfjord and Thule. But the best ones "grow" off Angmassalik and if you want the best you have to go there.

"Tupilak" means helping spirit. These carvings are not like any other you find among the Central Eskimos, the American or Siberian Eskimos. They are truly unique to the Greenland. It is generally accepted that they originated in the time of Eric the Red and his expeditions into Greenland and Iceland. And he realizes that after some time the tupilak is being threatened by something. And he gets a little suspicious. Now the turbulence is off his port beam and he ignores it. But after a while it comes up again—nothing there, just turbulence on the water. And finally he gets angry and frustrated and because he's a hunter he unleashes his harpoon. And then... (he suddenly hurl an imaginary harpoon out toward the shoppers on Fort Street) the spirit of the tupilak is under the water and gets out of the way of the harpoon and catches the line and pulls the hunter in and drowns him.

There's a problem with this manner of settling accounts. If the victim happens to be a hunter of very strong character and very difficult to scare, he realizes that after some time that a tupilak has been set against him. He notices that he is doing stupid things, things that he knows better than to do.
A world shaped by dreams

MARTIN HONISCH was born in 1942 in the geographical region known as Moravia. Moravia has been called by various political names—Austria, Czechoslovakia, Germany—but for Honisch it was another world, and it fell to pieces in 1945. "It leaves its marks on a child who grows up in it," he says.

Honisch grew up in the turmoil of Eastern Europe at the crux of the old world and the new. He fled with his family in the face of the Russian invasion of Hungary, arriving in Vancouver in 1957. During the 1960’s Honisch studied art at the University of British Columbia and on scholarship at the Univer-
Often his imagery echoes wartime—downed planes, camouflaged tanks, armoured ships. Yet the scenes are not violent or malevolent; rather they are brooding and enigmatic. For these scenes are not set in the world we know, “the dark dungeon with its attendant horrors,” as Honisch puts it; “I try to avoid those reflections and rise above sad memories and rebellion.” He has created a parallel world called Sokolniki Park, “where things are the way they might be.”

Sokolniki Park looks strangely familiar, as if it was the terrain Bosch painted, and the homeland of René Magritte and Salvador Dali too. The woman on a couch in the jungle in The Dream of Henri Rousseau dreams in Sokolniki Park.

Honisch paints with an old-master technique as finely crafted as any you’ll see. His drawing is based on the “firm, bounding line” with which William Blake engraved his visions. Honisch paints with dark, even glazes that creak a rich profundity of tone. Hung in a quiet place at home, his paintings lure on with a gentle power of intrigue. They are paintings to live with.

The paintings are “without doubt mysterious, and the artist admits that most people have a natural resistance to things they don’t understand. Yet Honisch desires it. “The kind of art I enjoy most,” he reveals, “is images that I cannot figure out, that leave me stunned. Something in me is confounded.” Even if you don’t understand it completely, his work will yield great satisfaction. Approach it calmly. Relax, half close your eyes. Let the images come to you. Daydream, remember, wonder. Don’t be afraid.

Local artists Glenn Howarth and Phyllis Serota acquired paintings from Honisch’s first show at Stones Gallery in 1983. Honisch is exactly the sort of artist who should be well represented in the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria and the B.C. Provincial Art Collection. Winchester Gallery owner Bernard Raffo is to be commended for his support of this wonderful painter. Please honour him with your custom.

SPOON OARS AND OTHER SIMPLE PLEASURES

Sidney woodworker Gregory Brown prefers hand tools, spontaneous holidays, and rowboats with inlaid trim. His proficiency has made him a celebrity among those who work with wood.

By ROBERT AMOS

AROUND THE corner and down the way from the Swartz Bay Ferry Terminal a little workshop sits tucked in among towering cedars on McDonald Park Road. Inside, Gregory Brown, 40, is hunched over his workbench turning chunks of wood into truly fine furniture, boats, and musical instruments. No one who sees the slim leg of one of his traditional English tables can doubt his expertise. A circle of marquetry, inlaid with veneers, graces the top with the elegance of another age. The power tools lie silent while the hands carve, plane and saw with tools they built themselves, tools that put the measure of hand and eye into spoon oars, flutes, and candlesticks.

Gregory Brown is a celebrity in the world of woodwork. Television sought out his shop a few years ago. Wooden Boat Magazine featured his first boat in a cover story. When UVic’s Maltwood Museum and Art Gallery presented the Designer/Woodworker exhibit in 1982, Brown’s display was the focal point, winning him a description in these pages as “a living national treasure.” Maltwood director Martin Segger, writing in Canadian Collector, said “Brown must be ranked among Canada’s small but growing band of elite craftsmen who, in retrieving a dying art, have pushed it beyond its own traditions.”

Brown seems anything but a celebrity. Wispy-haired, wiry, soft-spoken and genial, the man and the gentle patience of his craft are indivisible. “I’m really out of the mainstream,” Brown admits, “I’m quite ignorant about what’s happening locally.” Perhaps that’s because he’s too busy keeping up the production in his secluded workshop. Only by working alone can he maintain his output. “Some people like to work with people,” he explains. “I like to work with wood.”

As a cabinet maker, Brown is best known for his traditional furniture. The most typical is perhaps the Pembroke table, a tea table standing on delicately tapering legs, with drop leaves and a single shallow drawer. The joinery is all mortise-and-tenon or dovetail; the materials are well-seasoned hardwoods. His special touch is marquetry, wood veneers of almost transparent colour inlaid in fan shapes.
It was then he met John Rood. Trained as a woodcarver in Britain, Rood came to Victoria with his family in the early 1920s. He soon opened a shop on Pembroke Street where Smith's Foundry is now located.

Rood executed much of the best ecclesiastical woodwork in the Victoria area and wrote The Repair and Restoration of Antiques, considered the definitive book on the subject. Approaching retirement, he was glad to pass along a variety of jobs to the antique shop. In 1977 he also handed over his workshop in Sidney, many of his tools and, doubtless, a lot of knowledge to this young man whose skills and tastes were so similar to his own.

The shop is small and sweet with the smell of cherry, oak and cedar. The floor is usually covered with current projects, with room for a couple of Raleigh bicycles and some chairs for visitors. Along the sides are two work benches, described by Martin Segger as "robust enough for the purpose but meticulously detailed with turned columnar legs and inherent striping." Above the benches rest neat ranks of tools. The handmade bow saws are as fine as musical instruments, dozens of chisels are graced with brass and rosewood handles; antique molding planes line up along a shelf; and wood screw clamps with hawthorn wood screws are ready to hold a table top in place. Brown says he bought a lot of the tools at the Tillicum Swap 'n' Shop in the 1970s, when they were just old tools, before they became antiques. The few power tools date from John Rood's days and work well, but they don't get a lot of use. "I like whatever I can do quietly and peacefully, without a lot of rust and noise," Brown remarks.

An antique armoire big enough to hang a canvas will await new furnish in the corner. It was made in Quebec around 1910 from burled maple, and Brown has repaired some of the ornaments. Next to it, a guitar awaits final forming. He has his heart set on a koto, his next instrument-making project. Lest anyone think his work is all precise and expensive, consider the stack of chopping boards he has cut and turned and bevelled specifically for cutting up garlic, and the circular handmills which he produces in an attempt to cash in on the craft market. "A vain attempt," he notes.

Even though a side table from his shop may cost $2,000, Brown doesn't get rich following his craft. He works slowly and depends on customers to seek him out. Victoria's many woodworkers could probably fill a furniture gallery along the lines of the one in Seattle, but Brown feels there wouldn't be enough customers to support it, and the markup would make his prices too high. He is well aware that he is making luxury goods. "You can't treat crafts like a union," he explains. "You can't say 'we'll make them listen, or we'll deprive them of what they need.'"

Brown will take on a remarkable variety of antique restorations. Recently he restored a 200-year-old French fan with a scene of gallant lovers painted on papier mâché which they don't get a lot of use. "I like whatever I can do quietly and peacefully, without a lot of rust and noise," Brown remarks.

"No one makes these oarlocks anymore," says Brown, turning a heavy brass casting in his hands as if it were a sculpture.
An exceptional record.
An exceptional opportunity.

Pembroke tea table: exquisite marquetry, sensual intelligence defining of Brass. A pair of these oak tables, presented in a mahogany box, was Brown's contribution to this year's Great Sydney Rowing Review annual event to which he is keenly devoted.

A few years back Gregory Brown took some time aside from other projects and devoted about 700 hours to building ligy. That's a lot of time to put into a 17-foot rowing boat. But the result is sublime. Technically it's a Whitelhall rowing boat, a style which evolved in New York Harbour before motorboats were invented.

The design has proven itself as a water taxi, as a ship chandler's workboat, and as an all-purpose public water transportation. Of course it could look like a fisherman's dinghy, but the finish on Brown's version is different. To compare it workmanship to that of a violin or guitar wouldn't be an exaggeration, as anyone who saw it at recent Classic Boat Festivals will agree. It will be there again this year, looking for a buyer with $7,000 to spare. Not concerned that it was Brown's first boat, the prestigious Modern Boat Magazine of Brooklyn, Maine, put it on the cover of their July/Aug. 1983 issue for a story called 'A Boat Lover's Dream.' The photos were replete with long dresses, champagne and parasites. This summer's best-seller has been pairs of eight-foot long spoon oars, another item which just isn't made anymore but which is ripe for smooth sailing. Brown first laminates three long pieces of local cedar and then starts carving. "It's an honest form of woodworking," he says. "I'm fascinated by the whole idea of beauty and function together. The oars are quite a complex shape and to make a set, a certain amount of time is involved." As he finishes a pair he leans them against his shop front. They usually find a buyer within hours. "I've never had a dissatisfied customer," Brown attests, "because I've never been a salesman."

Respect for wood comes first. "Wood is such a valuable thing," he says. "You've bound by your material and bound to honour it." For Brown, "bound by your material" implies design which is essentially conservative, respecting the way wood reacts to climate and mechanical stress. Yet "conservative" doesn't necessarily mean "old-fashioned." Some of his furniture is discreetly modern, while other pieces, like a pine blanket box with a top like a pirate's chest, bring the flavour of folk art to fine woodworking.

"I used to think that technical skills were the difficult part. Now I realize that the real trick is designing."
The Theatre - A Report from Victoria:
The Wonderful World of Edna Brown

The 1300 block on Government Street in Victoria sees a lot of action on a good night. Cruisers in Chryslers flow by the hookers who wait at the edge of the stream. Someone leans on every lamppost.

Just out of the hurly-burly nightscape at Government and Johnson is a haven - not the picnic table democracy of Little Sammy's burger shop or the subterranean fury of Pal's, disco for the gay crowd. It will never attract the swaggering buckaroos sauntering down the sidewalk from the Century Pub. In fact, it's hard to picture the clients of this world of manners and decorum sharing the sidewalk with the rest of the crowd. It's called Edna Brown's Little Dinner Theatre.

Built in 1909 as a nickelodeon, for the past three years it has been the home of Victoria's one and only dinner theatre.

Step into the spacious foyer, past the protective sculpture of the baby Hermes (guardian of travellers) and make yourself at home on the generous brocade sofa. Check your hemline and coiffure in the mirrors and catch your breath while your date makes the arrangements and the many statues finish their greetings - owls and fisherfolk and a plaster llama sitting on the carpet. Printed souvenirs of past performances warn visitors that this is going to be something very different: "Did you know? Edna Brown, an imaginative restaurateur, changed the history of dinner theatre one afternoon?..."

with restraint and sureness. She proudly welcomes you to her theatre, her home. She dreamed up the concept, styled the decor, wrote the play and now she's cooking the dinner. "Leave your coat in the checkroom dear," she advises. "The theatre is designed that way" (Coats would spoil the decor). And she's back to her cooking.

The theatre is just a few steps away, back past the bar. Everyone gasps at first sight. It's breathtaking, a tiny room (only six metres wide) like a jewel-box, decorated like a dream. It's very clean, finished to perfection with the best materials: foil wallpaper picks up the warm red lights set into the tables and magnified through glowing waterglasses. A mirrored staircase leads to a small balcony at the back. The tiny canopied stage promises wonders behind a ruffled curtain while love seats line up facing the stage - a gracious, genteel red velvet tunnel of love.

From the piano, Robin Sealy vamps softly: "Happy days are here again" and "People will say we're in love". The world of Edna Brown is taking over.

The audience sits entranced, taking in every detail - sparkly ceiling, designer cutlery, and the Aynsley bone china (service for 90) in a Chinoiserie pattern of birds and flowers dating from the 18th Century. "I don't wear jewellery" says Edna Brown, "but I like nice china".

In 1980 she bought the building at 1323 Government Street. Her previous restaurant was the Red Swing, which Howie Siegel turned into Pagliacci's, hardly believing the Royal Doulton china dinner service he inherited. He also fell heir to a two-metre mannequin in a red velvet dress which used to swing there, from a papier mache tree, beneath fibre-glass clouds. The decor was all dark drapes and mirrors, even the 16-foot front window. Edna Brown also ran The Sugar'D Mule (a euphemism for Sweet Ass?) in the Chateau Victoria Hotel from 1975 to 1980.

The menu is simple: Chicken Grand Marnier, Salmon with Hollandaise and English Roast Beef. During the brief wait for dinner, everyone is a trifle giddy, the bearded hairdresser and his boyfriend, the couple from Alberta, the young woman taking Grandma out for the evening. Quiet chat enhances the cozy atmosphere. Since the red benches all face the same way, everything can be overheard but no expressions seen; it's an eavesdroppers' paradise.

Edna Brown does the cooking herself, calling on a long career of cooking at Jasper Park Lodge, Banff Springs Hotel and, back in the early '40s, Vancouver's Macombo Club (where Yvonne de Carlo got her start). The meals are usually satisfactory and often include some extra-special feature like homemade blackberry conserves on the chocolate cake with whipping cream. Anyone who thinks the meals are less than extravagant should know that what she saves on the meals she spends on the actors.

Edna's dinner theatre project is the realization of a dream. Without government grants or sponsorship she runs a full-time theatre that will hire and expose young, untried actors. As one of them said, "I'm the only 16-year-old actor in town with a paying job." Many local directors and playwrights, among them Phil Wagner and Kevin Land, have been given a chance here at a time when it really counted. Said one: "I hope she never quits. With all the difficulties inherent in making this thing a go she has the courage and determination. She's producing theatre. It's totally new, all original and it's here."

The curtain rises, slowly, into the sky blue canopy, like Diamond Lil raising her fursome ruffled skirt pleat by pleat. Tonight's play is The Vicar's Daughter, one of Edna Brown's romantic suspense comedies. ("I got so mad at paying royalties that I started writing my own plays", she explained.)

The greedy vicar leaves his oversexed teenage daughter, Helga, and his oversexed garlic-and-onions wife for a "pleasant and profitable summer" with his flock. He leaves them in the care of Peter, a newspaper reporter, who promises to cure Helga of her problem - streaking nude through the house. As soon as the vicar is gone, Peter convenes a meeting of three members of the Association for Homeless Newspaper Reporters. Add an unsolved murder and the appearance of Benny, "a dangerous paranoid with homicidal tendencies" and you've got something for everybody.

Edna Brown's playwriting is based on giving the audience what they want, then adding a touch of her personal philosophy and, some say, throwing in autobiographical incidents from her own colourful life. What the audience wants seems to be sexy titillation and mystery. Helga keeps promising a nude scene and, in fact, plays the final minutes in her "skivvies" - a lavendar corset, bloomers and stockings. The suspense keeps the audience (of 10 or 20 - not all stay to the end) in place, if not totally entranced, for the 90-minute performance. Edna Brown's talents as an author rest partly on the ruthless efficiency with which she manipulates sex and suspense. As the play pours along in a stream of consciousness, the characters take sleeping pills or poison without

Edna Brown has written many plays and to date has staged Love and Lies, Breaking Out, The Vicar's Daughter and is now producing Noah in the Lion's Den, a two and a half hour musical which reportedly will be completely based on hymn tunes. She says they're all available on video, and that some have been staged in other cities, and are being prepared for passenger nights on a coastal cruise line.

It has been said of Edna Brown that "she feeds you and then she talks to you." What does she say in the plays? "I wouldn't believe a damn thing I read in the newspapers now. What a way to make a living - writing about dead nude girls. I'd rather write about live nude girls."

"Dora was a girl with a heart of gold. She didn't realize you had to sell sex."

Edna Brown speaks bluntly. She is proud to consider herself a rebel, a bit of a nut. One of her characteristics is a love of younger people; she surrounds herself with youth and it pays off. The Vicar's Daughter went through four directors in a few weeks and then it was left up to the young actors, whose dedication and intensity never let up. Peter, the pivotal role, is played by 16-year-old Dominic Lawless. The calm of his remarkable performance holds the cast together on course. All the other characters are morally reprehensible but somehow endearing. Helga, played by a scrumptious 17-year-old (Cathie Whitney), fights off a repressed nymphomania that allows for no character development but keeps the audience transfixed.
Occasionally Edna Brown will appear at the back of the theatre. She's been known to bang the pots loudly in the kitchen if she isn't pleased with the performance, just one of the ways she controls every aspect of her creation and keeps her staff in fear of her impulsive decisions. She sometimes hires and fires on the spot, though some loyal employees have become like family members. "Benny" writes his own parts in the plays - he's a fixture.

Her regular audience may be unsophisticated theatrically, but they are loyal. They exit smiling, and send postcards from all over the world - "a unique experience, so enjoyable". When the mood is right they gather afterwards in the banquet room downstairs to sing and linger beside the plum-tree mural.

And when they go home, the creator, her pacemaker working overtime, keeps going until 3 a.m. She's back up at 7 a.m. Her vigorous constitution is sustained without medicines: "I let my ideas out - I don't get headaches". Besides painting and playwriting, she's working on her autobiography, where the truth about her teenage homesteading days in Manitoba may finally be told. She's a voracious collector of antiques, the best of which are in her penthouse apartment upstairs.

She's shrewd, tough, and protective, but without ever losing a lovable streak of zaniness. Edna Brown's Little Dinner Theatre is not for everyone. It will only work on those susceptible to the magic of manners, decorum and tastes of a 72-year-old lady, and not just any 72-year-old lady.
This year every third person yearns for a trip to Japan. The western liberal meekly approaches Japan as a tea ceremony world with spiritual underpinnings. The hard-nosed businessman on a five-day tour sees Japan as a ripe market. Yet for a westerner who speaks the language and lives in the ordinary workaday world there, Japan has a different aspect.

Such a man is Byron Black. He has been in Japan for the last three years teaching video production at Osaka Photographic College. A rare bird, this Black is simultaneously a conservative salaryman and an avant-garde artist, a man who can see the unique mid-Pacific culture from many points of view. And for him the bloom is definitely off the rose.

Tall and balding, dressed in white from head to toe, Black stands out. He's forty two years old, a naturalized Canadian, born and bred an army brat in Texas. At the school in Osaka, "Buracku-san" stands before his class of twenty five Japanese teenagers. The boys try to ignore him while the girls fidget, repressed and volatile, as Black expounds video theory in rapid-fire Japanese. He's a westerner on fast forward, teaching or travelling or showing his art in galleries, museums and department stores.

Black went to Japan the first time in 1962, after making friends with Japanese at the University of Texas. He says: "I was drawn to Japan, and I got there as a teacher of modern language methods to Japanese high school teachers. I suspect that I was there long ago."
Probably in a previous incarnation I was a Japanese. I have a very strong suspicion that a lot of people, especially those who died in the war, came back again on the other side because of negative attraction. Take a look at the way the character of Americans and Japanese men has changed over the past 25 years. Now there's a large element in North American men of sensitivity and subtlety, of awareness and latitude which you didn't have in your traditional "yohoho" swaggering American guy. Conversely, in Japan there is a new hard-edge aggressive attitude. It's not discrete, it's not circuitous, and it's not very Japanese."

In the morning when he takes his desk at Osaka Photographic College, the night cleaners are still finishing up. First Byron works on his international correspondence. "Mail Art" is a fixation with him and he launches a fleet of post-card missiles daily. His other creative projects go ahead until, two hours later, the students arrive and Black is calmed down and ready for them. "Students don't like too much energy," he says, "They're still tired and trying to wake up." Even so, his classes are especially stimulating. He's the first non-Japanese to teach at the school, and he's a practising artist too.

When he was invited to the College in 1980, he was teaching "English as a second language" for his tenth year at U.B.C. in Vancouver. In those ten years he had repeatedly gone broke as an experimental film-maker with grand visions, and here he was offered access to state-of-the-art video gear, wages and free rent. The new posting was welcome, to say the least.

Up till then, the self-styled "radioactive aristocrat" had been too fast moving, too far out. But these days, when the news reports increasingly read like the novels of William Burroughs, his work is seen to have a lot of relevance. At the new Vancouver Art Gallery's opening on October 15, Black's films, video tapes and electrostatic colour copy prints will be part of the History of Art in Vancouver, 1970's section. At the same time, the International Print Exhibition in Frechen, Germany, will feature his work, already familiar to Japanese museum goers. Belated recognition is a way of life in the art world. By-passed in the seventies, Byron Black is getting his due this year.

The pace of life "in the fast lane" of downtown Osaka has prepared Black to take advantage of this success. But the rocket send-off of Japan takes its toll.

"I spend much of my time trying to avoid the intense stress - and my school is a Mickey Mouse outfit. The staff at my school is not in danger of being fired or of making great mistakes which will cause the death of somebody. But the stress is everywhere. Of course, some people have grave responsibilities to handle. Across from us, for example, is the gas engineering company. Okay, you've got to get the gas right, otherwise you're going to have a serious explosion, and you're going to have bodies lying around. Right? In our school we don't have such grave responsibilities. However, everyone's under such frustration, such stress. And it's very contagious."

Many young men now show signs of breaking out of the drone-like existence of the company man. "I've watched them when I've been in the major companies doing translation work. Come 6 o'clock the 24 year olds want to go home. 'It's time to go home', they say.
The 45 year olds glance up muttering over their desks, scribbling things off, pushing papers around, because they're used to being there every night till 9 o'clock, six days a week. When something comes in, it has to be done right now. Pow pow pow."

Black himself works late at his second job. "At the advertising agency where I work, I always ask this question: 'How soon do you need it?' — which is the most stupid question ever breathed. They've got to have it right now. Why? No 'why' about it. Because everything happens that way in Japan. That's why the businesses are cooking. And the companies are cooking. The people are paying a very heavy price which is their mental health and their physical health. You give virtually your entire life for the company. Eight in the morning till nine at night. And then you go out with the same people you've been in the office with all day, and you drink till 11 o'clock and discuss things. Then you go home on the train, you fall in the bathtub, wifey tucks you in bed, you get up the next morning and you're off to the company again. The kids never see you. On Sunday you go out and play tennis with the kids and you go through the motions... but you're too wiped out from the whole week, you're so exhausted that you can't do anything. And this is not an unusual case."

Bachelor Byron's answer to this lifestyle is not to bail out, but rather to keep ahead of things in the "techno-anthill". Black lives life at a relentless pace. In his home in the Osaka suburb of Senrioka he's up at 4:30 a.m. to do his meditation before the atmosphere is jammed with action. Then, in quick succession, he runs a few miles, takes a deep bath, smokes a cigar and drinks a cup of potent espresso.
coffee. Finally astride his motorcycle, he flies off to the school.

"On the motorcycle I always go like a bat out of hell, and I'm afraid they'll catch me on the bike doing 140. I'll have had it.

"Apparently at the speed traps, if you're a woman, or if you're young, or if you're driving a red car or a motorcycle, you're especially vulnerable. They won't stop big black Lincolns with curtains and lace doilies in the back, and they won't stop rich people. Especially yakuza (gangsters), because they are afraid of them. It's power and influence, isn't it? In Japan the yakuza and the government are hand in hand. The gangsters get their hands slapped, they get lectured. The finger is pointed and they are asked "please be careful in future". It's gangster capitalism. The government uses the yakuza to keep the populace down - to keep crime organized. As long as crime is organized things run smoothly. For example, go to New Jersey, the streets are clean, your sister can walk the sidewalk. You cross over to Manhattan, it's like anarchy. Wild in the streets. But in New Jersey... why, it's a Mafia state. You aren't going to mess around with the Mafia, or you end up 'without due process of law'. You get a concrete overcoat. And in Japan, in the major entertainment areas, these big bruisers keep the traffic moving, they 'keep a lid on', as you might say.

"There are very few cops in Japan. The government's really stingy. That's why they're so rich. Very few police. Traffic police - if you get caught - Woe! - you get the book thrown at you. Once I took the rap for somebody else's parking ticket. I was asked to say I had parked the car illegally in front of the office. I went down... it took me half a day, two interrogations, standing in for a parking ticket.

Four hours, twenty-five bucks and half a day of interrogations. It was nothing unusual. There were several hundred people there - you could see they were dug in and ready to do their half day.

"Not a nice interrogation, either. Question A, question B, question C, question A, question B... And they compare your two answers. For a parking ticket! It didn't matter. Once you cross the line... But getting caught is very hard."

Years ago when Byron first went to Japan he was the object of a lot of attention simply because he was a foreigner. Students accosted him to practise their English and he was treated royally wherever he went. But times have changed.

"I feel a lot of aggression towards foreigners, not much of it directly expressed, but lots of 'clipping'. Clipping is not right. The referee will penalise you five or ten yards for clipping. I get clipped all the time or I have to step aside. I am walking towards somebody, necktie, suit, you know, someone who works for a company, he'll clip me.

"Shoulder to shoulder. Clip. It's the same as in football isn't it? Bam, pass on by. And when it happens three or four times in a row, it manages to transfer to you a degree of rage and frustration. It isn't like Thailand. Because if someone tried that in Thailand, he'd get shot to death immediately. End of story. But in Japan, things are discrete, circuitous, one is not quite sure."

However, certain groups of foreigners fit in very well because they're not too different from the Japanese themselves.

"Mormons in Japan are very big. Not that they are successful there, because Japanese are basically wary of Christianity or foreign doctrine. But Mormons in Japan are well understood because they are such straight arrows and they are so completely rigid that it fits into that very rigid society.

"The nature of existence there is very defined. And I think the kind of soul which incarnates in Japan wants the following characteristics: it wants extreme stability, security, predictability and safety. It wants to cultivate its own obedience, it wants to be guided from above, and it wants to have a kind of harmony. These are qualities you have to respect, it someone wants them.

"Robert Rauschenberg (the American artist) fitted into Japan very well. He's like an old master. He knew what he was doing. He wanted to do this and do that in a very civilized, a very scientific, studious way. He bowled them over.

"Yet Rauschenberg was funny because he didn't want the media to look over his shoulder. The immediate news coverage was okay - but other stuff, very personal - 'no, please, no, thankyou.' Yet that's how Japanese media coverage is. They want to get right in. They really like to interfere. If they don't interfere they haven't really gotten the image. So at a certain point he said 'No. I'm trying to do this, please.' They had to console themselves with being outside and peeking in through a little window. The Peeping Tom School of Journalism. They just go too far.

"It's on the news everyday. For example, there's a weeping mother who was dragged away from the scene of the accident. 'Are you sad your children were killed? Yes? How do you feel? What do you think is going to be done about this? Yes, I see. What plans do you have for more children? Okay, thankyou, fine, fine.' I've seen that.
I just get so enraged, I feel like kicking the TV in the ass.

"Twenty-one years ago, when I first went to Japan, there was some sense of what can still be found here and there - the graciousness and the enjoyment of the moment for its own sake with no regard to profit or loss - that's going, that's gone.

"Of course, you can catch glimpses of that antique world. That's why the elderly in Japan and people who still live life that way are like refugees in their own country. They're like refugees.

"I'm sorry that I have to be so strongly critical of the current mood, the lack of flexibility and consideration I find in Japan. It's smash and grab capitalism. It's go, go, go. It's total distraction. That's the fundamental social disease of the moment. Distraction.

"There's annoyance also, people are not happy. What is this we've done? We've worked so hard, we've conquered all these barriers, these goals, we've got this much. But somehow this is not really what makes us fulfilled. And there's always more to get and somehow things are not right."

Joe Plaskett: A Retrospective from West Coast Collections

Maltwood Museum, University of Victoria. (721 829B). Until November 11.

"There is a secret garden in me that I wish to cultivate. I leave it to the young artists to wage their revolution."

If you like the sensual aspects of painting, the darts, drips, dashes and oily squibs of colour - Joe Plaskett is your man. If you imagine that an artist should live in a 15th Century house in Paris, surrounded by exotic treasures from the Marche aux Puces supping on Camembert and Beaujolais with men and women of genius - then Plaskett's your man. His extensive show at U. Vic.'s Maltwood Museum (until November 11) includes landscapes and architectural studies in pastel but that Paris apartment and those who visit are the real subject of this man's work.

Joe Plaskett was born in New Westminster, B.C., in 1918. Brought up in the rectory there, his early days were spent in the countryside above the Fraser River. "Close at hand were ruins, gardens, a 'shinto temple and cemeteries', he recalls. In this idyllic setting, combining country and town, life was quiet, provincial, old-fashioned - a golden age, the quality of which Plasket still seeks to rediscover.

His art training and Canadian career touched all the bases - U.B.C., the Vancouver School of Art, Banff School, Winnipeg Art School, and Emily Carr Scholarship and a year at the Slade School in London. Since 1957 he has been painting full-time in Paris, though "with frequent and often long trips to Canada", he admits. At this point the inexorable march of his biography seems to have ceased. He works in his Paris home and history spreads out from there as his circle of visitors and models expands.

The apartment is a sort of time machine in which mirrors and clocks and myriad antiques help him travel to the era of the impressionists when the artists' task was to capture the ravishing impressions of the play of light. Plaskett's romantic soul impels him to paint the people he loves yet his skill and joy in painting carry him beyond the model to fill his pictures with virtuoso flourishes. Chevaliers and fencers, actors, poets and languorous lovers people his canvases while billowing curtains, glistening chandeliers, melon riads and mantlepieces cavort in the background. Yet Plaskett is not a symbolist. A fellow artist observed "he is one of the few people I know who do not view things moralistically."

Simply put, the man paints very well, his approach is warmly human, and he is achieving a sufficiency of success. This exhibit is a bit jammed in, a bit unselected, but if you like painting - the art and the object - Plaskett's your man.

DU Ring the past summer Keith McKellar was a habitué of the harbour, doing drawings to sell, laying out his cards on the causeway and living with the gawkers all day long.

Now his best work has been published in book form. line-poem drawings isn't a very revealing title, but the stark black covers tell one man's visual jazz, 40 pen-drawn improvisations on life as he finds it.

Individually the success of these drawings depends on our recognition of the subject matter, for McKellar has chosen Victoria (and some scenes of Vancouver and Mexico) as his field—coffee counter boys at Ian's Coffee Stop; ladies blethering over tea in Oak Bay; Clifton "Odd Job" McLean leaning on a trash can at Yates and Douglas. McKellar's cartoony style captures our unsung local heroes in recognizable form. Arabeques spring from his pen and echo the vitality of the street people, the forthright riffs of sidewalk musicians like Harmonica-mom at Eaton's. The tight-knit cross hatching captures each permanent wave as tea is taken in the Empress.

One by one these drawings are amusing, but gathered as a book, McKellar's cartoons begin to reveal his philosophy. From his curbside viewpoint he presents the other side, "a vista into the comic-climate of the cafe and street," as he puts it. The street characters seem to be down-trodden, yet in his view they are fallen angels, light spirits who have accepted their position in the scheme of things. The artist points out that the icons of these realized souls are "sprinkled amidst cafe-gatherings of the overties— tables of very-worldly pastries, the waiting and the weighted-low mateless in the late afternoon." McKellar's cafe scenes bring to mind the characters who T.S. Eliot described as "measuring out their lives in coffee spoons."

It's a curious little book—a self-published limited edition, entirely pictures with just a few words of text for each one. Yet the artist—who fancies the alias "Laughing Hand"—has put a line around the temper of the times in Victoria. Aren't there a lot of us passing the time, waiting in Victoria? When you see McKellar at work (in the Harbour Public Market until Christmas) ask to see the book. It's all true.

The selling of ceramics

EIGHTH ANNUAL VANCOUVER ISLAND POTTER'S PRE-CHRISTMAS EXHIBITION AND SALE. Georgian Lounge, Empress Hotel, Nov. 15-16, 12 to 9 pm

ROBIN RIGHTON showed us around his small house on the edge of Swan Lake. The house seems unpretentious but there is a factory in the basement, and the ramshackle shed in the back opens out to reveal a business-like gas-fired kiln big enough to walk into. Obviously the man is a professional potter.

Eight years ago Righton, with Art Brendon and others, put together a show and sale of pottery, exclusively pottery and only the best. It has continued to be a small show of invited artists, artists of national renown like Jan and Helga Grove, Wayne Ngan and Walter Dexter. It seems these artists are too busy throwing and firing to hit the craft fair trail all year. And for their sophisticated ceramic art other show places may not be quite right—church basement sales may be too funky, and the recent monster exhibition at Vancouver's Sheraton Landmark too slick and huge. For them the ambience at the Empress is just perfect—close knit and high class.

Over the years this pre-Christmas sale has built a strong following. Buyers line up at opening time, ready to spend $200 or $300 on a couple of choice items—for they know that the potters bring their best, newest and most challenging work to this show. Lately it has become a marketing conference as well, when shop owners from the east take the opportunity to fly in and spend three days at the Empress, meeting a number of potters from the Islands, to see their wares and arrange shows for the coming year. Make no mistake: culture is an industry in Victoria and these potters are making it pay.

"There is a very high proportion of good potters here," Brendon pointed out. "At first they establish a market somewhere else, but they all move here for the lifestyle." It is true, then, that the quality of ceramics improves as you go west in Canada? "I notice an improvement— even between here and Vancouver," said Brendon. In light of a complete lack of local workable clays this seems remarkable, but the prospect of trucking all that material from Moose Jaw leaves our potters undaunted. The abundance of talent is stimulating and has set a tremendous standard in the market here.

Who buys it all? "I'd like to see a cross section," he mused, "They seem to be, you know, people with theatre tickets, people interested in the arts in some way. I'd say we get very good support from people here."

The potters deserve their success. Even as we talked Linda Mackie was working away in the basement workshop. With hot wax she drew a floral motif on the teapot she had made, then plugged the spout with clay and dipped the whole thing into a murky bucket of glaze. "We work afternoons and evenings," she said, looking up from the muddy corner. "Eight days a week," added Righton.

There are some very good outlets for ceramics in Victoria year round. The Potter's Wheel (633 Courtenay, in Nootka Court), The Handloom (625 Trounce Alley) and Out of Hand (1619 Store Street) all carry pieces by some of these artists. But the pre-Christmas sale is special. For the hard-working potters it's a social event—"this is the only time of the year when we get together," says Righton. And it's a chance for better displays and the best work, presented to an audience known to be discriminating and eager. Get there early.

A BIT OF VICTORIA CHRISTMAS TRIVIA

By BRUCE LOWTHER

1. The Legislative Buildings have lights all year, but they do help make Christmas more attractive. When and why were they installed?

2. How long has it been since the last White Christmas in Victoria, which means since we woke up to snow on Christmas Day?

3. Good Christmas sounds in town include the Netherlands Centennial Carillon beside the Provincial Museum, played by Herman Bergink. What centenary was marked by this gift?

4. Ask older Victorians why they went to Head Street and Moss Street when they were young, and what will they tell you?

5. The Times-Colonist 1000 Fund is only one of many local groups helping needy people. Which paper started it, in what year, what was its original name and who supplies the names to be helped?

6. Before the Second World War, and even before the first, many Victorians followed the tradition of going to church on Christmas Eve. Most walked; what was the second most popular way of going?

7. In Victoria and Vancouver, many people made sure, during Christmas shopping periods before the Second World War, to go to one store and hear the employees' choir. Name the store and give its name today.

8. To the children of today, some of the best Christmas lighting is in the shopping malls. Which was opened first: Hillside Mall, Mayfair or Town and Country? Be warned: It's a tricky answer.

9. Why does Victoria remember Christmas Day in 1966 with warmth and Boxing Day in 1968 without?

10. Christmas has had a special meaning for two well-known Victorians, Zebulon Worthington and Big Jim Ryan. What are the two meanings?

MILES LOWRY: LANGUAGE OF LOVE
Gallerie Untitled, 1618 Government St.
until Jan. 5

THE GALLERIE Untitled doesn’t suit just any artist. Inconsistent hours of opening, an unlisted telephone number and a dedication to the more mysterious aspects of visual art are just a few of the obstacles to popular acceptance.

But Miles Lowry’s show suits the space very well and offers an integrated art experience which could well be a model for other galleries.

The front window features a delicate and low-key installation by Waine Ryzak, another Victoria artist. Her glass teardrops and a veil set the mood for Lowry’s work, a nice bit of artistic cooperation. Inside the gallery, spacey/exotic music lends a mysteriously flavoured background to paintings capable of touching us on levels deeper than the surface.

Lowry’s paintings are mostly figurative, built on a solid foundation of drawing. In their evolution, Lowry draws veils, vapours and misty distances across faces full of yearning and absorption. Is it just the ethereal airbrush technique that implies the spirituality? "Actually, artists who want the mystical look choose airbrush," Lowry says.

The best of his series of paintings of veiled women is a watercolour titled Evening Star. It has been handsomely reproduced in colour as a 34x26-inch poster. By means of smaller posters and word of mouth, this show has garnered encouraging sales and a supportive audience. Good paintings, good promotion— have a good look.

Sid Fry set out to build a stone arch the old way, hauling and shaping by hand.

By ROBERT AMOS

STONE IS the most expensive material on earth to build with because of the labour involved—but you can just pick it up off the ground. It's the pure raw substance from this place," says Sid Fry.

Fry has just built an English-style stone archway, nine cut stones, standing without mortar, spanning the alley beside Southside Restaurant (1215 Broad St.).

Fry went into Southside the second night it was open and he liked it. It had atmosphere. Owner Alan de Fiore asked him to extend the front steps because women in high heels fell down there. "I made it like a diamond ring," says Fry of the herringbone pattern of bricks. "I thought, maybe if I did something really nice he'd want me to do more." Next he built a planter around the gas meter and soon decided to do something to hide the trash kept back in the alley. Fry encountered stone-cutting 20 years ago, working in the mason's shop at the B.C. Penitentiary. "There were guys in there who built that place," he says. They taught him the rudiments and he's been in love with the craft ever since, teaching others, "to go down, to give it back." Starting out as a bricklayer, he became a master craftsman, now the best stone cutter in the city.

The arch itself is modelled after L.K. Brunei's famous Maidenhead Bridge in Britain. "For some reason that arch..."
Arch builder Fry (r.) with Kevin, one of the “army of workers.” Fry picked up to help build the arch an army.” Fry scouted Yates and Douglas, offering jobs to people who could use the work and a meal. The rocks, weighing 1,300 pounds, were moved inch by inch up and over the 35-foot cliffs. These were heroic days and nights. Hard work and long hours wonnowed Fry’s volunteer crew. “He can be the most arrogant son-of-a-bitch you want to meet,” says one long-suffering helper. Fry admits, “I was running scared from day one. It was beyond me. But I had a vision. I believe in the Almighty.”

Again acting without permission, he searched and found

"Southside made me wait a month and then gave me $3,200 to do it all,” he says. Fry ordered $6,000 worth of Southside food while he waited. Southside is a new restaurant, located where the Cultured Cow used to be in the old Colonial newspaper building on Broad Street. Paperboys have gone to pick up their bundles in the alley for years. Fry knows the day his arch will lead to a candlelit café under the stars.

Work began in July. To get things started he went to Clover Point to retrieve a sandstone pillar dumped there as building debris. It’s nine and a half inches wide, five feet long, weighs 250 pounds, and was perhaps once part of Victoria’s original Post Office. Fry carried it two miles up from the beach between dusk and dawn. “I’m fanatical. I’m crazy. I won’t deny it,” he says.

He is well aware of Parks By-law 69-69, making it illegal to remove debris from the seawall, but he wanted those stones to match the original building. “I tried to get a tow-truck or a crane, but nobody would help me. So I picked up

The ARCH has nine rocks; each has six sides. That's 54 surfaces which are not square but each perfectly in tune with the others. The eight sandstone pieces were easy to carve, using two $10 chisels from Spencer's. But on the granite piece they used two $500 carbide steel chisels made locally by the Victoria-based and owned Kennametal, renowned world-wide for chisels.

The stones were cut and recut many times and it took two months to get the nine stones in place. "Do you think I'll ever get done? What is this, a con or a scam?" people asked.

'I was running scared from day one. It was beyond me. But I had a vision. I believe in the Almighty.'

but Fry's burning determination never left him. Nor did his gratitude to de Forest. "I'm only as good as my word, and I told Alan J I was going to build the whole world there," he said.

Many of the hundreds who stopped to watch suggested that with a diamond saw he could cut the keystone in a day. But Fry's crew did it the hard way, the old way, and eventual ly lifted it—415 pounds—into place by hand. People kept telling him "they're gonna make you tear it down if you don't use cement." But Fry didn't allow room for morter—the tolerances were less than one-eighth of an inch. Besides, he was working to an altogether different standard. "This is the nicest arch that's been built here for at least 35 years," he claims, and he has worked in the trade for over 20 years. The Engineers' Department came several times to visit but work continued.

Ferming an overhanging roof for the lights and planter at the base is a brick superstructure that was terraced and herringboned to the limit. Fry cut the bricks three times. "I couldn't seem to find the formula," Fry admitted. "A brick layer can lay 300 bricks an hour. I did one and a half. Nobody spoke to me for a month." Fry recalled. Then a "tinkle tinkle" of steel on stone was heard once across Broad Street. "Mind it?" Fry asked, "Is it nice enough it's gonna outlast me and my band of apprentices. Each day they fed as many as 11 workers, over 30 during the project. But Fry kept hiring.

"Work with me and I'll feed you, take care of you, talk to you, I'll help you smarter up and I'll teach you something that maybe will help you to get a trade," was his generous offer. By this time it was clear that the restaurant couldn't afford Fry. "This place was a baby and I was taking all the cream off the top. They couldn't afford me but they didn't shut me down. And so I just poured it in—both time and money. "As a mason I've made a lot of money and I've thrown away a lot of money." he said, and work continued. Finally the slate roof arrived. "When they got the bill for that they really freaked," Fry recalls. He could have done it with $75 worth of grey slate, but instead he chose red slate from Israel and green slate from Spain and Italy. The surface, a bit bigger than a sheet of plywood, cost $1,150.

For inspiration he kept James Dunsmuir in mind, the Dunsmuir who built Craigdarroch and Hatley Castles. "He respected and admires Dunsmuir," Fry mentioned. "He was dynamic. He set a good example. What a mind can conceive, a mind can achieve."
A dream come true

Shoulder-to-shoulder at North Park Studio's grand opening

"It's an art and people show," commented Luis Ituarte, as he surveyed the massive opening night turnout. Like moths to wool clothing, more than 2,000 people were drawn upstairs where they rubbed shoulders and raised a glass to Victoria's most exciting exhibition space, the new North Park Studio (1619 Store St., 381-3422). Elizabeth Rogers, wife of the Lieutenant-Governor, officially opened the gallery, calling it "beautiful, elegant and exciting."

Throughout the evening the high ceilings and built-in display cabinets brought gasps of admiration. So bent on enjoying themselves were the scene-makers that the string trio couldn't make itself heard. It is obvious that the visual arts crowd in Victoria is extensive, excitable, and has taken this venture to heart.

North Park Studios were, until recently, located at 951 North Park Street. There the art show openings always attracted overflow crowds and for some time owners Michael Cullin and Fran Willis, irrepressible renovators both, had their eyes on a bigger place, the former Buckerfields' warehouse. Now they've moved into their "dream come true." Across from the Johnson Street Bridge, overlooking the waters of the harbour, the new space shares the spirit of Market Square, the Harbour Market and Chinatown. In record time, between March and September, they built their unique cultural supermarket.

Having taken more area than they needed for their business, they've rented out six spaces. On the ground floor find Larousse, a non-smoking French restaurant. Next door is Out of Hand, a craft gallery and purveyor of architectural accessories (hand-made stoneware sinks, for example). Out back, Ian Rossiter works with silver, copper and brass, and The Finch Gallery does picture framing. Upstairs, the two jewellbox graphic arts studios have been taken by Pacific Illustrations (Soren Henrich) and the Weeks & Humphries partnership.

North Park saved the best for themselves. Their keynote has always been "post-modern classicism" and one approaches the second floor gallery through corinthian capitals, semi-circular windows and a cloudscape mural by Gordon Hughes. Lots of multi-level studios, skylights and acres of glossy wood floors set the tone.

Interior design projects like the Royal Victoria Yacht Club and the Beaconsfield Inn have been North Park's bread and butter. It is a special feature of their gallery that their design customers are exposed to the art, and the art shows are enhanced by a bit of "better homes and gardens."

At a recent brainstorming session at North Park, Bill Porteous spoke of the local art community's fondest hope when he described the "vital movement" which could go on within a gallery, "creating a centre for the arts, not just a show space."

"It won't be a pure art gallery a la New York," Cullin explains. "We'll show a mix, the best of art and design." Original work in glass, porcelain, tapestry, carpets and cabinetmaking enhances the paintings from Victoria and further afield. Music, dance and performance are likely to find a natural home here too.

At the same meeting, Herbert Siebner reminded us, "There are quiet times in a gallery when a painting speaks of itself," and we can expect those moments in abundance.

There's plenty to look at in the opening show. Those invited to exhibit took trouble to present their newest and best work. Top-notch paintings from Myfanwy Pavelic, Herbert Siebner and Pat Martin-Bates join super examples from Martin Honisch and Jim Gordaneer. Walter Dexter's vital virel vases and Sue Hopper's lacy porcelains are only part of the choice ceramic collection. Eliza Mayhew's iconic bronze sculpture is the finest work she's shown in Victoria in years. Young Louanne Rhine has reached new heights in painting, as demonstrated by her angst-ridden suburban scene; and fellow painters Brian Grison and Bill Goers both display fresh development in their thoughtful works. Don't miss Karl Spreitz' Who Let the Cat Out of the Bag, which was apparently painted on Max Bates' palette.

"Now that we have a professional gallery, we really do have an obligation to become more professional," said Cullin.

Victoria has long needed a gallery willing to develop artists, and willing to cultivate an audience.

Beyond trees and ducks

BYE ND THE MALAHAT, Open Space
Gallery, 510 Fort St., 383-8833
until Nov. 17

Beyond The Malahat started with a “bean feast,” 50 artists sitting down to dinner at a long table in the centre of Open Space. They had come at the invitation of curator Michael Harding to show Victoria what goes on in The Land of the Nanaimo Ferry. Surrounding them was a smorgasbord of the visual arts.

Work by 36 artists was brought down the Island Highway by consultants Tutti Cassano (Courtenay), Annette Hurtig (Hornby Island) and Richard Lewin (Duncan). This local selection process creates a better feeling among the artists than the technique of parachuting a selection committee in from outside.

And, perhaps surprisingly, these three curators have a taste for work vastly more challenging than what was chosen for the Community Arts Councils of B.C. show at Open Space last spring. Let it be said this art is not by “hicks from the sticks.” Most of these artists have made a conscious choice to live beyond the suburbs, there to nurture highly individual, often obsessive talents founded upon strongly-felt beliefs. Ducks and trees are in very short supply.

Most of the “famous” residents are not included— no Jack Shadbolt, no E.J.
Hughes, no Takeo Tanabe. But some artists with a following here are on exhibit— Will Julsing (a stone torso), Martin Honisch (a Bosch-like diptych), Jerry Pethick (a sculpture titled “Brushing by a chair in the dark while thinking of a Persian carpet in New York”).

And the sublime George Sawchuck steals the show. At the opening, Sawchuck stands off to one side, rocking gently in his boots, wearing suspenders and a sort of bowler hat. He’s an older man, a country man, re­ there is any amount of revolutionary and intellectual depth in his well-crafted logger’s sculptures. His work has brought international acclaim to his Fanny Bay home.

Outside the Malahat they really understand form. Even without any Indian art, the show has some delicious sculpture. On a carved wooden lintel by Nanaimo’s George Norris, four umbrellas (and what they shelter) are depicted. Renee Poisson’s delicately articulated Voyage Alone II is an assemblage of yellow cedar ribs, chamber music made visible. Wade Jones (Nanaimo) and Gus Galbraith (Lake Cowichan) both carve with obsessive, almost excessive skill. One dispaly by Robin Cambell (Hornby Island) juxtaposes a lump of rock with a perfect, tiny, pit-fired ceramic vase. Titled There is nothing between us but love, this simple statement has a profound effect.

And for the first time Victoria is blessed with the work of George de Pape, also known as Sammy Sammy, the Legend of Hornby Island. Poet and philosopher (among other things), de Pape was born up­ island in 1908. He has, over the years, embellished his 22-acre Place des Bois with the most heartfelt and honest folk art the west coast has ever seen. Consider the painted cement figurine crowned with a halo and draped with a scarf:

“This is my beautiful Anastasia long departed but still bugging me” says the legend. Sammy Sammy is the genuine article. When Michael Harding was setting up the show, the lights accidently flicked off at one point. By chance, the only one that stayed on was shining down on a little sculpture shrine Harding had set up as a memorial to de Pape’s wife, who had died a week before.

With few exceptions, the work on the walls is not as arresting as the sculpture. As expected, post-psychedelic Emily Carr undergrowth bespeaks long rainy afternoons
graphs definitely put camera work on the level of art. Boys on the Beach is a contemorary classic in the tradition of Jacques-Henri Lartigue.

Once again our thanks go to Michael Harding for showing us what a fine and extensive artistic community we live in. As he himself said at the opening, “When you feel support, your creativity explodes.” It’s a good, and necessary, show.

Having given out paragraphs of praise I would like to say that group shows like this leave me with an upset stomach. As with the Bank Art Show and the opener at North Park Studio, the hanging was horrible, the overall effect indigestible. It’s like an uncooked stew. We’ve read the menu—
now let’s order a meal.

The Art Gallery of Greater Victoria presents a unique look at the art and culture of the samurai

By ROBERT AMOS

SAMURAI, THE CULTURED WARRIOR, is a beautiful and informative show, a tribute to Barry Till, curator of the Art Gallery of Greater Victoria. When someone gave the gallery a full suit of samurai armour, he set out to put on an exhibition about the ancient warrior class of Japan. He succeeded, in spite of a refusal of funding by the Canada Council and the National Museum Corporation.

The samurai of Japan were a provincial fighting force. In the late 12th century they overthrew the indulgent courtiers and took charge of the country. The generalissimo of this fighting class, Minamoto Yoritomo, took control from the Emperor and, as Shogun, ruled over Japan from 1185. The samurai dominated the country until the Emperor was restored in 1868.

During the early years, warring factions within the samurai elite fought endlessly and honed a code of martial arts and supreme loyalty which still grips Japanese men. Later, in the long and peaceful Edo period (1615-1868) the samurai elaborated their peaceful pursuits — tea, ink painting and Noh theatre. Finally, in 1876, the Shogunate was abolished and samurai were prohibited from wearing their two swords. No longer did they have the right to kill disrespectful comúnitors on the spot. Yet even today, the spirit lives on in the selflessness of the kamikaze pilot and the loyalty to corporations in modern economic warfare.

The samurai was born to his class and was entirely dedicated to the service of his lord. This required total self-control and unquestioned moral obligation. At an early age he trained in swordsmanship, archery, wrestling, riding, spear-throwing and military tactics as well as the liberal arts. These pursuits are on display in the Victoria show. He also learned the rites of honourable suicide. Preferring death to capture, if badly wounded or outnumbered, he would perform seppuku (also known as hara-kiri).

For a moment he seemed to collect his thoughts for the last time, and then stabbing himself deeply in the waist on the left-hand side, he drew the dirk slowly across his right side, and turning it in the wound, he gave a slight cut upwards. During this sickeningly painful operation he never moved a muscle of his face.

A.B. Mitford, quoted in the catalogue. This readiness to end his life made the samurai fearless of death.

The samurai practised Zen Buddhism, a philosophy which considers all things as fleeting as blossoms on a bough. "It rejected the scholarly aspects of old Buddhist sects, despised ceremony, scorned the scriptures, and had a disregard for religious images," says Till. "It was a sect of contemplation, which stressed that one reaches sudden enlightenment from within rather than without." (We are fortunate that, to emphasize the importance of Zen, Till has borrowed calligraphy by Geshu and a Zen painting by Fugai from the Leslie Wright collection, among the finest Japanese art ever seen in this city.)

A fine suit of armour is the centerpiece of this show, as rare and beautiful as a stag beetle. It dates from the 17th century and is the gift of Mrs. Hana Ikoma and family of Osaka, Japan. Gallery Director Patricia Bev· vey records "the gift was given by them on behalf of their ancestors who preserved it, to our successors for whom we must pre serve it." In its presentation one perceives more than a suit of armour. Before a huge gilded screen painted with flowers, the living samurai seems to sit, ready for the fray. Cascading plates of lacquered steel are tightly laced with rivers of silk cord. Here is an irreplaceable helmet surmounted by antlers and crest atop an iron face mask set forever in a ferocious war cry. "I'd have a heart attack if I met that one," one visitor exclaimed. Five full suits are set out, each arranged like a miniature castle on its stand. The sounds of battle seem to crash in our ears while our eyes feast on battle scenes. Depicted in colour woodblock prints, war riors hack and slash their way to victory. The tale of the 47 Ronin tells of value bey ond the battlefield. In this classic of loyalty, 47 samurai avenge their master's death and then, to a man, commit honourable suicide. Victoria's series of prints is by Hiroshige, the most famous of all print artists. Arrows sharp as scapels, small cannons lathed with butterflies, and knives disguised as fans are a hit with the kids—"I wish I had that," gasped one little fellow.

After the samurai overthrew the courtiers, "they were eager to demonstrate that they were men of culture, not just men of the sword," says Till. Thus we are offered a chance to delight in the gallery's collection of No theatre masks and paintings by samurai. Also a tea house has been constructed in the gallery. Samurai cultivated the tranquility of the tea ceremony, the savour of eternity they found in the few fleeting moments of tea. And, as always, the flower arrangements here are in exquisite taste.

A half-hour video tape (produced by Chris Munson of Cable 10) is drawing rapt audiences for continuous showings near the bonsai trees. A large colour poster of the show is available for $4.75. And the catalogue ($15) is not only the perfect guide to the show but a book to treasure. Loads of superb photos, many in colour, were super bly printed by Soni Nis Press who donated the entire publication—typset, layout, colour separations and printings. This is a remarkable contribution to the gal lery. There really should be someone at the door with a stack of these fine books for sale. The supporting events—films, floss, demonstrations —go on until September 30. 1040 Moss St., 384-4101.
NE OF the sculptures depicts two Rocky Mountain sheep perched on separate pinnacles. It's called Missing Ewe. Elsewhere, two giraffes twine together in Nescacy. And a sort of horse with a goofy look in his eye scans the heavens— he's the Lunicorn.

Pat Reeve, the Victoria artist who made these ceramic pieces, calls herself an intuitive artist. "I'm manifesting the psychic reality of our times," she says. "Our generation gets all its images from Sesame Street and Dr. Seuss. Walt Disney showed us that everything is alive. He gave a soul and emotions to his creations, to trains, to everything. Now, when we see animals, we imbue them with human attitudes. I think that, in making my sculptures, I'm dealing in Jungian archetypal images," she adds, "but with a twist of humour."

She has been working in various media for years: "I was a weaver when that was valid," she notes. Now, these glazed and painted stoneware sculptures of tabletop size are a popular form in which to mirror the public's self images. Her technique is very good, but the images are foremost.

Though Reeve was a devoted horse-lover as a girl, she is no naturalist. "I don't see many animals; I'm a city person," she admits. To emphasize the point she brings out a statue of Chlorine, the Pool Rat. Then she shows her turtle with a head at both ends. ("I call it Condominium.") The double images and transformations are fundamental to her work. Consider the black horse with spikey mane, flaring nostrils and enough harness to make Sid Vicious jealous. He's a rocking horse—a Punk Rocker, of course.

At this year's Vancouver Island Ceramic Association show, Reeve made her debut, walking away with three of seven trophies: best amateur, the creativity award and most outstanding piece in the show. Her toys for adults are admittedly not high art, but Reeve models her horned and hooved caricatures with great skill and much wit. What's next? "I'm thinking of branching out into birds..." she says. "Or maybe a rock cod."

Hanging out in colour: When it was the Oasis Cafe, a mural depicting purple camels covered the side of the building at 615 Johnson St. (between Government and Broad St.) But now, as it has become King Solomon's Studio Cafe, something different is in order. Different, indeed! Proprietor (and artist in his own right) Jim Lindsay gave permission to local artist and high diver Jerome Zachary to let it all hang out with cans of spray paint. Now the wall is a fiesta of colour, with something to offend everyone—sex, drugs, comets on the pavement, even a portrait of the owner. Is it pornographic? You be the judge. Even better, confront the artist Thursday Aug. 16 between 5 and 8 pm. (R.A.)

How much for this, please?: Bill Johnson of Johnson and Small Books, 45 Bastion Square, realized every small business owner's dream about a month ago. A customer walked in and bought the entire stock in the store. It was all over in 10 minutes. Johnson and Small have been one of the premier sources for esoteric Canadiana, as well as books on aircraft and fishing. The store wasn't exactly "for sale", but Johnson was willing to accept the cash offer. The new owner recently purchased a seven-storey building in Vancouver and moved the contents of the shop over there at once. Johnson is planning a trip around the world.
A show of art that stops them in the streets

HERE IT is 1984 and the second stage of View Towers hasn't been built yet. There has been a plywood fence around a weedy patch at Fort and Quadra Streets since 1973, the owner lives out of town and his property is the scene of the Graffiti Artists Convention. Two years ago it was muralized by Victoria's many artists, and now the artists have done it again.

_Monday Magazine_ is a co-sponsor of the project, the artists donate their time and materials, and Island Blue Print is awarding prizes of $400, $200 and $100 of art materials to the three most popular panels.

To vote, pick up a ballot from either sponsor and deposit at Island Blue Print, 905 Fort (at the Fort Street entrance) by 4 p.m. Sept. 27. _Monday_ will publish the winners Oct. 3.

Everybody's got their favourite. Organizer J.C. Scott pointed out the polka dots in the background of #18, _Babalo_. "Meticulous," he called it, "like Lichtenstein." Pamela Brooks also came in for praise. "She brought a fist full of daisies and, holding them in her left hand, in a matter of minutes, painted them with her right," said Scott. Considering the scale, that's no mean feat.

I asked organizer J.C. Scott what's next?
"I'm tired of giving this landowner a free ride. The city should expropriate the site and turn it into a park."
